SIR,

HIS Noble Arabian approaches you in an English Garb, to congratulate your Return from so fertile and so glorious an Harvest of Lawrels, as the Scene of Buda has afforded you this Campaign; and at the same time to demand your Protection. His Quality of an Officer, as well as of a Stranger, will, doubtless, not only

I he Epistle Dedicatory. apologize for this Intrusion but endear him to all the Generous and Brave. He courts Your Patronage, Sir, as knowing that once obtain'd, it will be an infallible means to make his own Merits known. The Republick of Letters is more than a little indebted to his Country-men, for the nicest Speculations we have in all forts of Sciences; and We particularly to bim for this History, containing such variety of Revolutions and Events. This is what, Sir, I hope will attone for my Prefumption, in ushering this Noble Foreigner into your Presence. He was

The Epistle Dedicatory. was sensible he could no where lift himself under greater Gallantry and Expectation, and that his being your Volunteer afforded bim a mighty Prospect of a new Scene of Conquests. Here, Sir, he strikes in with the Universal Opinion: for how far may we not extend our hopes from such an indefatigable Application to labour, luch a matchless Intrepidity, such a maturity of Conduct in such green Tears, such a number of Irophies, with the Rapidity of your Progresses in the Field of Honour, of which the Spabies, Janizaries, and Tartars,

The Epistle Dedicatory. are the sad Historians? Yet tho' the greatness of your Exploits, Sir, is what all the World knows, and all the World admires; yet, you have other Embelishments that will no less deck up your Triumphs than all the lustre derived from the most glorious Expeditions. These are those precious Gifts, those rare Talents of Nature, that mixture of Sweetness and Maje-My that covers all your Illustrious Person, that Character of a Hero engrav'd no less in your Face than in your Actions; that easiness of Access, familiarity of Converse; that Soul,

The Epistle Dedicatory. Soul, great, good, and generous, and in every thing proclaiming the Divinity of your Extraction. These are the Excellencies that have already gain'd you an Empire over all Hearts; with which the Nation must be contented, till fuch time as that our Mighty Prince shall bid March to the best Troops in the World. And these are the Excellencies that do the more particularly engage me to be eternally, with Devotion,

SIR,

Your most Obedient, and most Humble Servant, the Governours of all his Kingdoms; who after having revoltev against their King, wag'd War upon one another, about the diviston of that great Empire. As I will add nothing of my self to such great events, save such considerable matters as occurred in those times; I neither expect nor merit Honour or Profit: I only require of him that shall read what I am going to write, that he would pray God to teach me what I ought to do for his service; and that he would supply what is not in me by his Grace: And indeed I am well assured of being blam'd for having undertaken so vast a design, and that several will find (as it is true) In Arathat it required both more lofty meallalhiand more polish'd Genuisses than mar, Highmine to give the necessary Weight

But after having agreed with them in this, they will allow me to tell them the Reasons that made me take Pen in Hand; and perhaps, they will be satisfy'd when I shall tell them that I was present in that War, from the first day that General Tariff entred Spain with Count Julian, until that he had finish'd that Conquest; and that there was no Battel nor Occasion, but whereat I was in Person, excepting the Sieges of Carmona, and of Merida; by reason that at that time, I was in the Province of Grenada, with that great any Memoires of all I had seen, than to have made them such as they are; and the greatest Criticks will be obliged to own, That if all Authors that undertake to write History, had like me, had some part in the Events they describe their Works would be much better received by the Publick, and not be, as they are, for the most part, full of Falsities and Uncertainties.

I make no Difficulty to speak in this manner, for as at the very moment that I write these great things, there are still People of that time, that, as well as me, have seen the greatest part of them, and who can give me the lye, if I do not relate them according as they passed? I shall content my self with taking them to witness of the truth; and I willingly submit my self to their Censure.

Since the Novelty of the matter, and the Form of this enting History, do possibly require something to be said for its better Illustration, I shall a little stress upon thy Patience, Gracious Reader, by so modish a Transgression as that of a Presace. A man seldom arrives at a Delicate Entertainment without running the Gauntlet of a bundance of Formality; seldom gets to Court without standing the Brunt of continual Ceremony; nor to the Enjoyment of a Mistress without brushing through a Confounded deal of VVooing and Riffling: And yet without being an Epicure, Ambitious, or a Lover; if the Scene be new, whatever trouble it may have cost him, he finds his fatisfaction. Now this is matter to urge for my Excuse in the present instance: For undoubtedly, hardly has there ever been fuch very confiderable Occurrences and Revolutions in the VV orld as those here described, and yet with which we are less acquainted: Thus the Learned, as well as others, will have wherewithal to gratify their Curiofity, and augment their Knowledge: This is abundantly made out by the Tran-

Translator, in the Differtation he had annnex'd: But he going into France this Summer, and leaving his Copy with a Friend, that Friend handed it to the Press; and it was agreed it would make the Compleater Book, were the Differtation adjoyn'd to the fecond and last Volume; though it proves the Truth of this History, by conferring it with the History of Spain, and several Arabian, Turkish, and Persian Manuscripts. His absence must at the same time Apologize for some, perchance, unpolish'd passages, which he would have refined had they pass'd his Review; which possibly, so far from being Blemishes, like Moles, rather heighten the Beauty.

But bating fuch small flips, what can be of more importance, than an account both of one of the greatest and least known Heroes that was ever in the VV orld, as was that Famous Arabian Monarch Almanzor; who after having taken Damascus, and Conquer'd the greatest part of Persia, and the Indies, render'd himself Master of all Africa that was known at that time; and whose Generals, having reduc'd Spain in subjection to him, could hardly curb themselves from passing the Pyrenees, and undertaking the Conquest of France, before they had received orders from their Master for that purpose. Yet do not our Historians so much as agree upon this mighty Princes Name, of the time when

when he Reigned, nor of the Year when the Moors pass'd the Streight.

But the Principal cause of our little acquaintance with this, and other the Histories of the Eastern Princes, is the Ignorance of the Arabick, Persian, Turkish, and Mauritanick Languages, which hinders us from being fo Critical as to know the good, from bad Books, written in those Tongues; and the difficulty there is, not only in under-. standing them aright, but in reading them also aright; infomuch, that after many Years Study, few People but do at length desist.

VVherefore we must needs own our selves the more indebted to Michael de Luna, for having taken the pains to Tranflate Abulcacim's VVorks into Spanish; fince this fingle History may stand in Competition with all those of the Greeks and Romans. And indeed, the Circumstances of the Conquest of Spain by the Moors, in the Year 7 1 2 of our Lord, are so curious. and the Life of the Caliph Almanzor, under whom this great Event happen'd, so fine, that Abulcacim Abentari, who accompany'd Tariff and Muca throughout that whole Expedition. may be faid to Challenge more. Credit than Arrian, who only writ after the Memoires of Ptolomy and Aristobulus, who attended Alexander in his; and that he has all the Qualifications necessary to merit the Character of the most persect of Historians.

Now

Now to shew the Authentickness of the Arabick Original, and the Spanish Version, many of the most Eminent Spanish Authors, as Pedrafa, Rodrigo Caro, Bleda, and others, Quote and Commend Abulcacim Tariff, as an Author the most worthy of Credit they knew: And as for Michael de Luna, his Tranflator, as he was a Citizen of Grenada, whence the Moors had not been long driven, he could know by Tradition many things that had relation to this History: And in all probability having been chosen by Philip the Second, to be Interpreter of the Arabick Tongue; and having doubtless had a great part in the Scrutiny made after Arabick Books, that compos'd the greatest part of the Escurial Library, he must have seen and examin'd all those that speak of the same subject; and that he would not have chosen it to have given it to the Publick, if he had not judg d it more worthy of it than all the rest.

VVe shall not descend to justifie this History particularly, referring that to the Differtation in the fecond Volume; wherein it is compar'd, and put to the Test with the most Authentick Oriental Manuscripts. Besides, we have been but too rude already, in detaining thee so long, when the Entrance is fo alluring. But through an overgreat Publick Spirit, I could no longer deny the English VV orld the Possession of so Ravishing a Mistress; and so have ground to hope that this piece of Generosity will meet with such a due Acceptance, as may quicken me to hasten out the next, and indeed more entertaining Volume. Anagilda, King Acosta's Widdow, withdraws, with the Prince her Son, to Cordoua: Rodrigo invites her to bring him back to Court to assist at a Festival. She goes thither, and departs thence forthwith.

N the Year or of the Hegira, Spain Hegira figwas govern'd by a King call'd Ro-nines Series, from drigo, of the Race of the Goths; a whence People that came into that Counthe Arabs try from the farthest parts of the North, reckon and who made profession of the Christi-their an Religion. This Kingdom did then years. The year enjoy a profound Peace, and was as 91 of the much under his subjection, as Arabia Hegirafalls could be formerly to the Great Almanton with the year, our Soveraign Lord. Insomuch 712 of our that this unhappy Prince (for we may well term him so) had the freedom to abandon himself to all the Vices, where-of Idleness is commonly the source.

B What

What curb'd him, was the young Prince Don Sancho, Son to the late King Acosta, his Eldest Brother; to whom *Har Mal- by confequence * the Crown was devolmucq, Roy- ved after his Death, and which had been only conferr'd upon him until the Majority of his Nephew. But he was loath to refign so precious a Pledge. and his thoughts were wholly taken up in contriving the means to appropriate the whole Authority to himself; which to him did not feem fufficiently Charming, as long as it was only borrow'd.

The more his Nephew became fortify'd in Body and Mind, the more this unnatural Unkle became peevish and uneasie. The Affection which all the Grandees bore him, much before the * Aldabir, time giving him a * Jealousie, which thing outwardly.

Queen Anagilda having sooner than any other, perceiv'd the ill will he bore her Son, seldom suffer'd him out of her fight, and only plac'd fuch persons about him, as of whose fidelity she was well affur'd. But, in short, the Affection she had for Don Sancho making her shrift into all Rodrigo's pernicious Designs, and to foresee the storm that was fuddenly like to come pouring upon her Head; she ask'd Rodrigo's Permission to leave Toledo, the usual Abode of the Kings of Castille, to retire to a City in Andalousia, called Cordoua, whither she took along her Son, and all her Houshold. This Resolution, which Rodrigo durst not thwart, made him harbour new and stronger Distrusts: He every moment fancy'd that his Nephew had attain'd to his years of Majority; that the Scepter was to be put into his Hands, and of an absolute King as he was, become his Subjects Pupil: And * Alcabir, fubmitted, looking on this fall as a thing worse subjected. than Death, he found no better means to screen himself from it, than to dispatch as foon as possible Don Sancho out of the World.

by the Moors.

To bring this Design the more easily and fecretly about, he caus'd a Turnament to be proclaim'd at Toledo; where feveral days were wholly spent in the Preparations for fo great an Entertainment: And as all People were invited to be there on the day it was to begin, he sent a Courier on purpose to Cordoua, earnestly to entreat Queen Anagilda to Honour it with her Presence, and with that of the Prince her Son. This Princess ever labouring under the apprehensions of some Treachery, at first wav'd with Excuses the undertaking of this Journey; but at last, being preis'd by the Messengers that were sent upon the heels of one another, she consulted those in whom she thought she might confide: They all agreed, That the Diffidence she harbour'd of her Brotherin-Law was well grounded, but that it became her not to suffer it to be perceiv'd: That Rodrigo wou'd eafily guess the Reason why the Prince went not to Court, and so might be urg'd to Extremities, for which they ought not to give him any occasion.

Immediately after, Orders being given for the Departure, and the rumours thereof being spread about Andalousia, several Persons of Quality came to ask the Queen leave to attend her; and she being willing to be accompanyed by the most People she could, with joy accepted their offers. Thus did she repair with a very numerous, brisk and stately Train into the Province of Castille; at her arrival at Toledo, she was there received with all the Honours due to her, and found the Court extraordinary full.

She was lodg'd, with all her Train, in a Stately Palace, wherein she had hardly remain'd the time necessary to recreate herself after the satigue of so great a March, but that the day appointed for the solemnity of that Festival being come, she was conducted in Ceremony, upon a Scassold erected, and spread with Tapistries magnificently, in a place where the Prince D. Sancho sat in the middle, having the King his Unkle on his Right Hand, and the Queen his Mother on his Lest.

As foon as this Entertainment was over, (it having been perform'd with much Joy and Magnificence) notwith-flanding the earnest entreaties and inflances made by the King D. Rodrigo, to oblige Anagilda to stay some days to divert herself in his Court, she remain'd fix'd in the Resolution she had taken; and alledging the best Reasons she could bethink herself of, she took her leave of him, and return'd in all haste to Cordoua, with her Son, and all the Company she had brought along.

Rodrigo being extremely vext, that fo fudden a departure had robb'd him of the means of executing his perverse Intentions, and touch'd to the quick,

At last he refolv'd upon what we shall see in the following Chapter.

Rodrigo causes the Prince Don Sancho to be taken into Custody. His Mother frees him out of Prison, and goes with him into Africa

Odrigo, after having miss'd of so fair an occasion to rid himself of his Nephew, was too much dejected for to be able to refolve on any thing in himself. But it was not sufficient to find out expedients, there needed fuch People as were capable of making use of them. Astolpho was the man of all the Court in whom he had the most Confidence; wherefore upon him did he unburden himself of a * Secret, that * Amr, the lay so much the heavier upon him, as Care, the that he meant to have kept it to him-thing. felf; and offer'd him at the same time all the Gold and Money that was in his Power, and the Governments of the most considerable Places of his King-B 4 dom, if he could help him to bring about his design.

Astolpho wanting neither Industry nor Malice, advis'd him to practice false Witnesses, that might charge Don Sancho with some great Crime: Reprefenting to him. That when he should cause him to be confin'd under the colour of Justice, no body could find fault therewith; and that during the Prince's Imprisonment, it would be eafie for him, either to put him to death, or to render himself in such manner Master of the Kingdom, that it would be impossible to divest him of its Administration.

The King very much relishing this Contrivance, was not long without causing D. Sancho's Process to be made; who by the Informations, was found charg'd with Crimes as black and notorious, as needed to authorize the clapping him up into Prison.

Astolpho having receiv'd the Commission for this purpose, departed from Toledo, without the least suspicion being had of the occasion of his Journey, and reaching Cordona before it could in the least get Wind, he entred the Prince's Chamber, whom he found fleep-fleeping, in perfect fecurity from any fuch like Treason; and passing with all expedition across the City, that dreamt not in the least how matters went, he carry'd him through the Mountains making the Desart, that separate Castille from Andalousia, into a little Town that may be seen from Cordona, from which it is not far diftant; and is call'd The Tow-The Tower of Stone. er ofStone in Sierra

The Queen, amaz'd at so unexpect-Merena, ed a Blow, was for some while without Land or Mounknowing what to resolve on; but as tain, she had more Courage than her Sex brown, does usually afford, and quickly suspected how the case stood, she resolv'd at any rate to free her Son out of fo great a Danger. She at first design'd to have fortify'd herfelf in that Town, and to have provided it with all things necessary, but fearing Rodrigo might come to beliege her there, she packed up all she had most precious, and having assembled her most trusty Servants, she withdrew to the most Western part of Spain, into a place called the Algebres, belonging to Count Julian; the same that a little while after occasion'd the loss of Spain. Not finding herself even there in fufficient fecurity, she thought the best course wou'd be to put the Sea between her and D. Rodrigo, and go feek in a foreign Country for fuccours to conquer her own. This Resolution * being Resoluti- taken, she caus'd Astolpho's Nose and Ears to be cut off, as a Traytor to his King; and pass'd the Streight, after having fent him back to the King her Brother-in-Law, with a Letter, which, Translated out of Spanish into Arabick, is as follows.

Thou wouldst do much better to make War upon thy Enemies, and conquer some one of their Provinces, than to attack a Woman and a Child; wherein thou hast not any Honour to acquire; and wherein thou canst not miss of ruining it in this World, to lose after that thy Soul in the other. condition? He acquainted him how that having taken Don Sancho, and bringing him along towards Toledo, the Queen his Mother issued out of Cordona, with abundance of Horse and Foot, and had us'd fuch expedition, that she had overtaken him on the way, had cut all his Party to pieces, whatever refistance he had been able to make, to endeavour to hinder her from rescuing his Prisoner from him; and that she would, doubtless, have put him to Death as well as the rest, had she not thought fit to reserve him to carry him this Letter; which he did not expect would be over welcome. The King, after having taken it, ask'd what was become of Anagilda and her Son? And he having reply'd, That they had taken Shipping for Africa, he was so sorely griev'd, that his Affliction had like to have made him run mad. He went and shut himself up in his Closet, that he might so with the more freedom give a loofe to the vexation he had for the unhappy event of his Enterprize. He could not then forbear opening the Queens Letter; and as Truth has great force, he felt in that moment some Repentance for what he had done. But Ambition being the ruling Passion of his Soul? the remorfe of his Conscience did not trouble him so much, as the fear he had lest Anagilda should go demand fuccours of the Moors against him. This made him fend in all hafte for Count Julian, to whom belong'd the Castle of the Algelires, where she had resided for some time before she went into Africa, that he might by him discover the intention of her Journey into those This Count being come to parts. Court, and having affured the King, that she went away with a Resolution to prevail with the Moors to wage War upon him, he resolv'd to send this Count into Africa, to endeavour to divert this Storm; and to procure the better welcom for his Letters to Muca. who was then Vice-roy for the Caliph Valid-Almanzor, he accompany'd them * Hadda- with a world of Presents, and made via, or ra-ther Had-him the offer of entring into a Treaty dya, Pre- of Alliance with his Master. Anazilda in the mean while falling fick, through Grief rather than fatigue, was oblig'd to stay for for some time at a City of Africa call'd Tangier; by which means Count Julian had feen the Vice-roy, and and presented him with the Jewels sent him by Rodrigo, before he had heard talk of her. Muca receiv'd him with much Honour; and after having treated him several times in a House he had caus'd to be prepar'd for that purpose, he made him answer, That he could not of his own head resolve upon any thing of what Rodrigo required; but that if he would stay some time, he would write to the Caliph Almanzor, who would, undoubtedly, receive in due manner the advances of fo great a King; and would do all that should be most fitting, and most suitable for both.

During these Transactions, Rodrigo receiv'd Tydings, that Anagilda and D. Sancho were both dead at Tanzier; which inspir'd him with mighty Joy, feeing himself at the point he had so long wish'd to be at; and believing he had now nothing more at all to fear. He nevertheless imagin'd that the Amity of the Moors might be of some use to him: For which reason, he wrote to Count Julian, that notwithstanding the Prince's Death, he should nevertheless remain in Africa, to wait the event of his Embassy.

After

After having taken these Precautions for abroad, his thoughts were now only bent how to fecure all things at home. where were still some Princes that might dispute the Crown with him. He caus'd the States to be held at Toledo, where, D. Sancho's Death being made known, he caus'd an Oath of Allegiance to be taken to him by all the Grandees there assembled, as Don Sancho's Lawful Successor to the Crown. He had likewife his Coronation perform'd in great Ceremony, and with all the rejoycing that is wont to be us'd in fuch like folemnities. But in the midst of all this Joy, could not he refrain from labouring under fome Difquiet; and to free himself wholly from it, and to put himself into a posture that he should not need to dread any thing from any of the Grandees, or any of his Subjects, the only People he imagin'd he needed to fear; having learnt the good success of the African Negotiation; he bethought himself of expedients, whereof mention shall be made in the following Chapter.

CHAP. III.

Rodrigo causes most of the Fortresses of his Kingdom to be dismantled; and commits several Violences, that make him incur the anger of God.

T is very true, and Men have daily but too much Experience of it) that having once believ'd Fortune ** Albath, propitious, we ought not to expect that felicity, it will so long continue: On the con-perhaps trary, as it has not any stability; and whiteness. that it is inconstancy it self; the more it smiles upon us, the more ought we to distrust it; and often expect that she delights to invite us, by small baits and allurements, to run after her, to abandon us afterwards, when we shall stand most in need of her succours.

Of this there can be no greater, nor a more illustrious Example found than Rodrigo: For after having render'd him absolute Master of all Spain, and pro-

cur'd him to be Crown'd King thereof; * Albu-fram, loss, she took a pleasure in * despoyling him destructi-, in a short time, of all she had conferr'd on on, from him, and tumbled him from his Throne. the Root. by the fame means he pretended to ders it mi- make use of to defend himself on it.

Such of his Subjects as he most distrusted (for he had no longer any Apprehension from Strangers ) were fome Grandees, and Governours of the Places of Andalousia, and of Caltile, who had been of D. Sancho's Party. Wherefore he began to make fure of their Persons; and after having put them to Death, he caus'd not only their Castles to be raz'd, but most of the strong Places of Spain; reserving to himself only such as seem'd to him most necessary for his own security; wherein he put fuch men as were wholly at his Devotion. He did not think this sufficient; He caus'd Proclamation to be made through all his Territories, That not any of his Subiects henceforwards should have the boldness to bear any fort of Arms, nor to keep any in his House; and that all People should bring them into his Palace, upon pain of Death; imagining that after the People had thus laid afide the the Exercise * of War, and should only * Alchiad. addict themselves to Agriculture, his Government would be much more abfolute, and much more quiet.

But the poor Prince was much mistaken, for not being then curb'd by any fear, he abandon'd himself to all manner of Irregularities and Dissolutions, according as I have been told by Spanish Bishops, and other persons worthy of Credit, of whom I made enquiry, during my abode in that Country: So far as that he made no difficulty to put the worthiest persons of all his Kingdom to Death, that he might have his Pleasure with their Wives and Daughters. So loose a Life occasion'd an Universal Disorder: For as Kings are look'd upon by their Subjects as the Models by which they ought to square all their Actions; and that, indeed, they feldom fail to imitate their Vertues, and still more their Vices: The bad Example of this Prince pass'd on to the People, who would needs equal him in Wickedness and Libertinism; insomuch that we need not wonder at the punishment God inflicted upon them.

Rodrigo being still young, either out of the defire of perpetuating himself, which which Nature inspires into all Ani*Haigua, mals*; or from that of having lawful

At that time was there in the Eastern part of Africa a King call'd Mahomet Abhehedin, who had but one Daughter, of an extraordinary Beauty, call'd *The Spa- * Zahra Abnaliaca: This young Prinher Etiatia. cess walking one Evening upon the Sea-shore, with her Maids, and some of her Fathers Servants, it feem'd to her so Calm and Charming, that the fancy took her to go on board a Ship, fo to divert herself upon the Water. Her Attendants, without making over much Reflection upon what they did, did not divert her from the Defign. The Marriners made ready the Ship, all her Company were eager to go with her on board, and in the merry pin they all were; they did not mind that they distanc'd themselves a little too far from the Land, whither they did not trouble their Heads about returning, while it was in their Power. In the mean while the Wind changing all on the fudden.

fudden, the Storm became to great, that being unable to put into any Port of Africa, they were constrain'd to abandon themselves to the open Sea; and were at length drove upon the Coasts of Spain, in a place call'd Al- * Alcapia, capta by the Arabians, which in that Place of Tongue fignifies a Place of ill luck; ill luck. and by the Spaniards, Cabodegata; where they were all taken, and made Slaves by the Christians of that Place. It was easie to see by their Cloaths and Equipage, that they were Persons of great Quality; infomuch that whatever Care the Moors took to conceal * Huffan, that of the Infanta, she was known at diffusife, length, and brought, with all her Train, to Rodrigo; who being informed of it, gave order that she should be handlomely received, and treated in all Places.

He was well made and Gallant, the Princess was Young and Beautiful; infomuch that Love easily engaged them, and quickly augmented by the Entertainments he made her, and by the soft Conversations they ever had together. The thing came at length so far, that the King having offered to Marry, and place the Crown of Spain upon her

The Men and Women of her Retinue that were minded to be converted, and stay with their Mistress, had considerable Settlements in Spain; and those that could not be perswaded to that, return'd into Africa, whither they brought this News. Mahamet being very uneafic for his Daughter, was so surpriz'd to hear that she had abjur'd his Faith, that he dy'd of Grief; and by his Death left the Crown to Avilgualid; who, as his nearest Relation, fucceeded him in his Kingdom. We shall see in the series of this History the unhappy issue of this Marriage, as well as the Amours of this Prince with Florinda.

CHAP. IV.

Rodrigo falls in love with Florinda, call'd La Caux by the Arabs. She fignifies to Count Julian, her Father, then in Africa, the violence done her by this Prince.

Ho Rodrigo was marry'd, he led the same life he did before he was Resque, fo: He nevertheless fell in Love with Gallenone of the most beautiful Ladies of his try. Court, call'd Florinda, Count Julian's Daughter; who was at that time in his African Embassy. She had Wit enough to perceive that the Kings Courtship did not at all tend to her own Honour, nor to that of her Family, fince that it, doubtless, only aim'd at Ravishing her of it; and she had Virtue enough to receive his fondnesses with much indifference and Modesty; but the more firmness the exerted, ed, with the more obstinacy did he persevere to overcome it.

Now for the more easie effecting of this his purpose, he made several new Regulations in his Court: Among other things, he order'd that when he should eat with his Queen, none but the Ladies of the Palace should serve at Table. and requir'd them to be dress'd finer than ordinary on fuch days. This being thus establish'd, one day after Supper, whereat Florinda had ferv'd with others, he so order'd matters, that he caus'd her to enter a Room void of all other Company, and following her thither, whatever refistance and screams fhe was able to make, he gain'd of her, at length, by force, what the never would have granted him.

Being under the utmost Despondency at fuch an Outrage, and not knowing how either to be Reveng'd or Comforted, she resolv'd to make her Case known to her Father. In those, after having contriv'd the most mysterious terms the could bethink herfelf of, that they might only be understood by him, she made use of those of this Letter; which, Translated out of Spanish into Arabick, is as follows.

Flo-

Florinda's Letter to Count Julian, her Father.

He regret I have for the absence of a Father so dear to me as you must needs be, makes me in Writing to you, feek the Consolation I cannot find, of seeing you. Not that I mean to send you all the News of the Palace *, that ever * Mabran, affords sufficient that deserves your knowledge; this is only to acquaint you with one, which, though it be already old in this Court, will ever be new for fach a Maid as I; and will ever appear in the Eyes of the whole World very strange, for such a great Prince as Rodrigo. Ton must know then, my dear Father, that I had heedlesty, left upon a Table the Ring I fend you in this Letter; and was not so careful to lock up close this precious Jewel, which I esteem'd more than my Life, and which you and my Mother had so earnestly recommended to me: But the King having a desire to it, impetuously threw himself to take it; and seeing I would not give it him, he drew his Sword , and gave it * Hucan So many hacks, that whatever screams and Almuque, Coutelas struglings I us'd to hinder him, he has, Royal.

My Mother is very ill, and I still worse. I pray God to preserve you.

King, after having given him his Expeditions as foon as he defired them, was very much furpriz'd, when at his taking his leave of him, the Count ask'd his permission to carry his Daughter to the Algesires, to stay some time there with her Mother, who was very ill, and mighty defirous to fee her. But though this went very much against the grain, he could not handsomely refuse him his Request. And thus the Count went with her to the Algefires, where he made some days abode. Count Julian being throughly informed of the outrage done to his Daughter, resolved to be Revenged, and to deliver Spain to the Moors.

So foon as the Count was got to his own home, he made Florinda relate more precisely, and more particularly what she had written to him in obscure terms; and when he was fully certain of the shame of his Family, and in such sort as was past all doubt, then was his Grief so much the more sensible, in that he saw that the person that had done him so great an outrage, was his Lord and King, from whom he seem'd to be under an obligation of enduring all, and that it was impossible for him to wreak his Revenge.

Wherefore not knowing what to do in this Distress, and not minded, without mature deliberation, to abandon him-himself to all that his Passion might suggest, he, with all possible secresse, affembled his Relations and Friends, who interesting themselves in the affront Rodrigo had put upon the Count, and animating one another to Revenge, after having found that they were not frong enough to affert their Resentments, unless back'd by a foreign Power, they unanimously resolv'd that the Count should return into Africa to treat with Muca; and that they on their parts should abide in their Houses, waiting the fuccess of his Voyage. After having all embrac'd one another, and engag'd to keep this Enterprize very fecret, the Count took Shipping, with his Wife and Daughter, and whatever he had of value, which he carry'd along with him into Africa. He was very kindly receiv'd by the Viceroy, with whom he had ftruck up a particular friendship in his Embassy; and told him immediately, That he was come to him, not on the behalf of the King of Spain as the time before, but on his own account, to offer him to deliver up all that great Kingdom to the Caliph Almanzor; and that if he could prevail with him to favour the Party

Count Julian going on board a Felucca he had caus'd to be fitted out on purpose; and in a short time being arriv'd in Arabia, where Valid had then his Residence; he presented himself to him, and gave him Muca's Letter of Credence. This Prince caus'd his Council to assemble, to examine a Proposal of fuch great consequence. The Count was there heard with great attention: He had a thousand Difficulties put to him, which, as he was a shrewd man, * The Aand understood * War as well as any Harb, the Captain of his time, he found it no hard matter to answer: He had a thoufand Questions ask'd him: all which Military Art, Stra- he neatly folv'd. The Count D. Julian having brought this Letter from Almanzor to Muca, it gave him great fatisfaction: And in pursuance of the Emperours Orders, he made a small Body of fix thousand Foot, and some few Horse, which he put under the command of a very brave man, call'd Tariff Abenriet, of the City of Damus; whom he enjoyn'd with Count Julian to pass the Streight, which the Spaniards call of Hercules*, and which after this was call'd by this great

Tariff seeing things still more easie than he had imagin'd them, gave an immediate account accordingly to the Vice-roy; who fignify'd to him, not to flay the longer for that in this Country, but to return speedily again into Africa, with all his Troops. He obey'd his Orders, though with some reluctancy, and went back into Africa with great Riches, and an infinite number of Slaves; carrying along with him all those, that having declared themselves for Count Julian, durft not stay any longer in Spain, but expected to return thither in a short time with greater Forces: ws we shall see in the sequel of this History, they fail'd not of doing.

CHAP. VI.

Rodrigo enters a Cave that was at the Gates of Toledo, and thinking to find Treasures therein, finds only Presages of the loss of Spain.

The King Rodrigo having had notice of the descent of the Moors into Spain, with Captain Tariff, and Count Julian his Enemy; and that, after having over-run all Andalousia, they were return'd with many Slaves; was not so anxious for what they had newly done, as for the apprehension of the long and dangerous War; with which he saw himself threatned; it being easie to judge that Tariff had not made that tryal, to stop there,

He knew Count Julian to be a Man of Wit and Execution, of Courage, and a through knowledge of War, a Natural Spaniard, that knew the state of his Affairs, knew the Country, had there

many many Adherents, nay, and Places, wherein he could enter and go out as often as he pleas'd. He eafily perceiv'd, but too late, the fault he had committed, in losing, for a moments Pleafure, a man of fuch importance, and in giving him to his Enemies. He made reflexion upon the bad posture of his Kingdom, fince he had difarm'd his Subjects, and caus'd all the strong Places to be demolisht. He considered that the long Peace which Spain had enjoy'd, was the occasion that he had no Disciplin'd Troops, and that when he had affembled an Army, they would be only raw men: All this plung'd him into furious Disquiets. He ask'd Counfel of all People, and found none good. At length, having consulted an Arch-bishop, a Relation of his, call'd Torrife, and having told him the little Money he had to raise and keep forces on foot; this Archbishop persuaded him to break open a Place called the Enchanted Tower, where there was faid to be a Treasure. And as this is a thing very extraordinary, I am willing to infert here at length what the same Torrife told me; who shortly after quitted that Kings Party, to come to Count Julian in our Camp; and who could give the best account of it, as having been present when D. Rodrigo caus'd it to be open'd. Now this is what he then told me.

About a mile from Toledo, between steep Rocks that Ive East of that great City, there was formerly a Tower, of a very ancient and very magnificent structure, tho a little endamag'd by Time. that confumes all: Under whose foundation was a very deep Cave, feparated into four different Vaults, across a very narrow Entrance cut in the Rock, where a great Iron Door had been made up, with a thousand Locks, and as many Bolts: Upon this Door there was Greek Chara ters, that feem'd rather Cyphers than Letters, and might be diversely interpreted; but whose meaning were, (as those pretended, who thought they knew them best ) that the King that should open this Cave, and discover all the Wonders that were therein, would certainly find a great deal of Good and Evil.

Several Kings before this, had had a desire to shrift into the truth of this mystery, but whatever Orders they had given for that purpose, they had never by the Moors. never been able to cause them to be executed. Upon the opening this Door, so great a Noise was heard, that the Earth seem'd to open at the same time under the feet of those that meant to enter therein: They were feiz'd with Hauf. fuch a dread, that most of 'em fell sick upon't, fome dy'd, and no body had the Courage to enter further. The Door had still been shut up more strongly than before, and People still believ'd that the time appointed for the breaking fo great an Enchantment was not yet come; but Rodrigo's ill fate would have it that this fatal adventure was reserved for him. He had chosen very resolute men to enter with him into that Cave; but they had not gone very far, when the Torches they had being extinguish'd, the greater part fled away, out of a pannick fear which feiz'd them, of a terrible Hobgoblin they faid they faw. The King in great anger caus'd other Flambeaux to be lighted which he had caus'd to be made on purpose, after a particular manner, that fo the air of the Cave might not put them out: With this light he entred the first of all, and without shewing any fear, tho perhaps he was not exempt exempt from a little; hardly had he gone some steps, but that he found himself in a beautiful Room, enrich'd withas delicate Sculptures as those we see in the greatest Palaces: In the midst of this great Room was a Brazen Statue. with a fierce posture, plac'd upon a Pillar three Cubits high, holding in its * Macmah. hand a * Battel-Axe, with which it struck the Earth from time to time. and fo strongly, that there was reason to believe it to be partly the violent agitation it occasioned in the air, by the blows it gave, that made the great noise that was heard at their entrance.

Rodrigo, tho a little startled, did not however lose Courage; and began to conjure this Phantome; telling him, That he did not pretend to commit any Disorder in the place of his abode, and that he would go his ways as soon as he had seen all its Wonders.

He had no sooneruttered these words, but the Statue lest off beating the Earth. The King and his Attendants being a little encouraged, most carefully visited all the corners of that great Room. On the Lest hand of the Statue they saw these words written on the Wall,

**The Words with the Statue of The Wall,

**The Words with the Wall,

by the Moors.

Unhappy Prince, thy ill Destiny hath brought thee hither. Turning to the Right, he found nothing better, for there was written, Thou shalt be dispossed by foreign Nations, and thy Subjects shall be punisht as well as thee, for all their Crimes. Upon the back of the Statue was written these words in Arabick, To my Succours: and upon its Breast these, I do my Duty.

If or got to fay that at the entrance of this Room there was a kind of round Fat, like a Bowl; from whence there iffued a kind or fpout, whose furging made a hideous murmur.

After having well confidered all these things, and caus'd the Inscriptions of them to be taken in a Table-book; the King went away very much disturb'd, and very peevish; and had no fooner turn'd his back, but that the Statue fell again to striking the ground, after its usual manner. The King caus'd this Cave to be shut up again more carefully than before, and had its entrance stopp'd with Earth, that so none thenceforward might enter therein, forbidding all his Attendants to make the least mention of this Adventure, by reafon of the terrour that so ill a presage might might put into all Peoples minds: But nevertheless is was immediately buzz'd about all the Court.

The Night following Crys were heard, that waywards, like to those that People make when they are fighting; and after a Clap, that made a mighty hurly burly, this old Tower funk; and all people were amazed the next day to find no more footsteps of it, than if all they had seen before had been only a Dream.

The King having affembled the Wife men of his Kingdom, to demand of them the Explication of all he had feen: They found that the Brazen Statue, with its perpetual motion, fignifyed Time, that was oblig'd never to stop, as was noted by the Inscription it had upon its Breast. That that which was on the Back fignifyed, that in the fequel of time, Spain should be conquered by the Arabians: That of the Walls presaged, The loss of his Kingdom, and a great Calamity of all his People: And that above the Door, The great Evils the Conquered would suffer, and the great benefits the Victors would thence derive.

Such an Explication gave no little anxiety to Rodrigo, and to fuch of his People as heard it. They all lift up their Eyes to Heaven, well feeing that it was from God alone that they could hope for any fuccours. For tho they had news that Tariff and Count Julian were returned into Africa, this was not capable of re-affuring the King against fo many intimations of the anger of Heaven. Whereupon he began to order the re-erecting all the Fortifications he had caus'd to be demolish'd; and had Proclamation made throughout his Kingdom, that the People should take up again the Arms he had forbidden, and exercize themselves therein, as before. He refolv'd also to quit Toledo, and go make his refidence at Cordoua; that so he might be nearer the place, from whence apparently all the mischief was to come, and thereto apply Remedies the more eafily.

Muca sends Tariff and Count Julian into Arabia, to give an account to Almanzor, of the success of the Voyage they had made into Spain.

Ariff Abenriet and Count Julian being returned into Africa, much fatisfy'd with their Voyage, were there admirably well received by the Viceroy; and after having among themfelves concerted the means of effecting their Design, it was resolved, That this Captain and this Count should both go to Almanzor's Court, to communicate to him, and render him a faithful and an exact account of all they had done, and of the propitious Disposition wherein they had found the People of Spain: well perceiving it to be difficult by Letters to remove all the * Hirilat, doubts *, and folve all the Difficulties Inconve- that might be started upon an affair of fo great a moment, as the Conquest of so great a Kingdom; and shew upon Paper, and at a distance, so great an Enterprize, fo eafily as those could do it by word of mouth, that had themselves considered things more nearly.

Whereupon having caused a Ship to be fitted out, and having provided themselves with all Necessaries, as * sarra, well for their Subfistance, as for their Martial Safety; after having weather'd a furi-Men. ous Storm, they at length arrived happily in Arabia, where having prefented themselves to Almanzor, he receiv'd them as well as they could wish, and had them lodg'd and treated with all their Train, and all the Souldiers they had brought along with them. Tariff in a few days after his arrival, had a long audience of Almanzer; in which, after having given him an account of all he had done for his fervice, he promis'd him, That if he would do him the honour to fend him back into Spain, and rely upon him for the Conquest of so great a Country, he would subdue it in a little time to his Obedience. The Confidence with which this great Captain spoke, had so much power over Almanzor's mind, that he immediately caus'd his Council to affemble, with it. still more particularly to examine all the Difficulties that might be met with in fo great an Enterprize, and all the means he propos'd to bring it about. Whereupon, this affair having been agitated with mature deliberation, and accordingly reported to the Emperour, and debated anew again in his presence. At last the Conquest of Spain was refolv'd on, and the rumour of the De. claration of War against the King Don Rodrigo spread immediately throughout the whole extent of the Caliph's Empire. Tariff, who had already exerted his Valour, as well as his Conduct, in other occasions, wherein he had acquir'd Almanzor's esteem, and that of all the Arabians; knowing the Country better than any man, and having entred into strict Engagements with Count Julian, it would have been both injustice and imprudence to have taken from him the Command of the Army: For which reason he was at the same time nominated General, and these are the Letters Patents that were issued out to that intent.

He Great and Warlike Valid Almanzor, of the high Lineage of Motaleb, Vicar of God, and the Defender of his Law; Son of the most High and most Noble Caliph, and potent Ruler of all the Arabick Nation, Abdulmeleck; to all those who shall these present Letters see, Greeting. We, for certain considerations and just causes us thereunto moving, having Ordered, as We Order by thefe presents, the Conquest of the Western Kingdoms, that are possess d by the King, Don Rodrigo, a Christian by Profession, our Capital Enemy; by reason of the great profit which will redound thence to our Subjects, and the augmentation which will thence accrue to our Empire. We have resolved to nominate and chuse, as We thuse and nominate by these presents, for Governour and Captain General in all those Countrys, the Noble, the Virtuous, Honoured and Renowned Captain, our Vassal, and Faithful Servant, Tariff Abenriet; whom for this purpose We empower to go with the Troops We shall cause to be given him, into the Territories of Spain, and there execute the Orders that we shall cause to be expedited to him, and do all that to him shall seem fitting, for the accomplishment of our Will, without his needing to stay for new Orders from Us, on that account. We enjoyn all Governours of Places, Officers and Souldiers, as well those he shall lead into his Army, as those of all one Realms, that they obey him, and execute his Commands, as well by Sea as by Land, as if they were iffued out immediately from us, and Sealed with our own Seal, and Sign'd by our own Hand: Giving him for this purpose, Power and Authority sufficient to give them, and expedite them, under the penalties he shall please to establish; and which he may cause to be Executed, as Soveraign Judge, upon the Persons and Estates of those as shall Countervene them, and shall be Rebels to our Commands, which We have encharg'd him to accomplish and execute, in the entire Confidence we have in him: For such is our Pleasure.

The Conquest of Spain

The year 713 of our Lord, in the month of Decem-

Almanzor had still another Captain, a Greek and Renegado, called Hiza Humani, in whose Valour he had much Confidence: He gave him the Command of the Troops he caused to be rais'd in the East, of which he quickly made a Body of thirty thousand good Men, and well Armed. At the fame time he fitted out a great number of Ships, wherein he put not only all forts of Ammunition, but a great abundance of Arms, Tools and Instruments of War. And as foon as this Fleet was ready, he Shipp'd all the Forces, and caus'd it to depart on the thirteenth * In the of the Moon of Inmod, and the second year 714

For which reason he dispatch'd a Manaway on purpose, to the King of Thunis, his Ally, to impart to him his Defign; and represent to him the great advantages he might derive from the Conquest of Spain; conjuring him to come and joyn him, and fuccour him, as foon as possible, with what Foot and Horse he could

This Envoy having put himfelf into a Felucca, was not long on his Voyage, and met with a most welcome Reception from the King of Thunis, who express'd much loy to see, by Avilgalit's Letter, and by his Envoys discourse, that he would make use of him in this occasion. He caus'd the Drum immediately to be beat throughout fall his Kingdom, and in a short fpace levied an Army of thirty thoufand Foot, and three thousand Horse: the Command of which he would needs give to Prince Mahomet-Gilhair, his fecond Son. What troubled him most, was the few ships he had in a readiness to put to Sea, as not being prepar'd for fo great an Embarkment. For which reason he was oblig'd to cause all these Troops to wait in a Body, till the arrival of Merchant Ships, wherein he caus'd them to embark; and at last weigh'd Anchor, on the 2: month of of the Moon of Sanguel, in the same themselves might not be lost, Tariff and Count Julian were sent before, with a small Body, to make a Descent into Spain; and enquire into the state things were in fince their Departure thence; and what Forces the King D. Rodrigo might have on foot. The Troops they chose for this Expedition were to the number of fix thousand Foot, as well Moors as Julianist Christians; and about three hundred Horse: With these they cross'd the Streight of Gilbralter, and having found a Mountain by the Seafide, fitting to Encamp the few Troops they had, Tariff gave it his own *Name, as being the first place where he * It is still began to establish himself. already hinted.

Astolpho going directly to Tariff, and Encamping in fight of him, there was at first several Skirmishes between the Horse of both sides, wherein that of Tariff had the disadvantage, which so intimidated the Moors, that it had already quite discourag'd them; when that on the morrow morning, at break of day, one of the Sentinels perceiv'd a Christian Woman, with a Staff in her hand, on which was a little white Streamer, for a fign of Peace: This Womah being taken, ask'd to speak with the General of the Army, faying, the was come to bring him fuch News as would undoubtedly be agreeable to him. As foon as the was in Tariff's presence, she prostrated herself at his Feet, and having embrac'd them

A Prediction made by a Religious.

Related to General Tariff by a Christian VVoman.

CIgnior, I am born in Spain, and am call'd La Testue. I remember that about fixty years agone, when I was very young. I heard my Father relate, as I was in the Corner of his Chimney, a Prophecy. importing that the people of our Religion should lose the Government of our Country. which was to be conquer'd by the Moors: And among other things, it was precifely mention'd, that the Captain who was to make this Conquest, should be very brave, and have on his Right Shoulder a Mole very hairy, of the bigness of a Pea, nay, and that his Right Hand should be much longer than his other; insomuch, that without stooping, he might cover all his knee with that hand. He who made this Prediction is an honest Religious, for whom we Christians have a singular veneration. I earnestly conjure you, in case you have these marks I have newly specified, in recompense compence for the good News I bring you, to fave our Lives, I and my Children; and to hinder any injury from being done to their Persons or Goods.

Tariff having caus'd what this Woman had newly faid, to be explain'd by a Christian Interpreter he had with him, was overjoy'd to hear these things. He strips himself immediately, in the presence of Count Julian, and of all his People, and having caus'd the place the Woman instanc'd to be view'd, they found there the Mole she had mention'd, and the Right Hand longer than the Left, tho not quite so long as the had faid.

This News being spread about the Army, occasion'd an universal joy, and all the Officers would needs share in that their General had, to hear, by infallible proofs, that he it was that was to have the Honour of fo noble a Conquest. And indeed he was resolv'd to give Battel, and therein to vanquish or dye. And that all the Souldiers might have the same Resolution, he would needs deprive 'em of all hopes of Retreat.

by the Moors. For that purpose, as he wanted no industry, he secretly caus'd Fire to be fet to all the Ships that had brought his Troops, and referv'd nothing but a small Vessel, nay, and would needs have that too put out to Sea, for the fending by it to Muca, the good or ill News of the Battel.

Tariff having given this Order, and by a Speech, short indeed, but pithy, animated his Souldiers to the Conflict: It was very bloody and obstinate on both sides, but at length the Christians were put to flight.

Astolpho, wanting neither Heart nor Conduct, perform'd in this occasion, not only the Duty of a General, but alfo that of a Souldier; he Rally'd the Runaways the best he could, return'd several times to the Charge, and would never yield himself up, whatever entreaties he had made him, chusing rather to dye with his Sword in Hand, as all those are wont to do that are jealous of their Honour, and are resolved to leave no room ever to be * re- * Almubaproach'd that they have done any thing tida, to blame contrary to the Fidelity they owe their wrongful-King. without

In this action Count Julian was dangerously wounded in the Arm with a Partizan, and Tariff slightly in the Left Leg; which very much afflicted the Moors and Julianists.

The Conquest of Spain

The News of this great Defeat being come to Rodrigo, he was extremely griev'd, particularly when he knew his General Astolpho to be dead, and that he had been defeated by fuch a small handful of men.

Tariff and Count Julian retired forthwith with their Troops to their former Camp on Tariff, from whence they fent in all haste to Muca, by the Bark he had reserv'd on purpose for this intent, the News of this first Victory, earnestly defiring him to Ship, with all expedition, the two Bodies of Army that had been left in Africa, for their refreshment; which Muca fail'd not to do, fearing they might need them.

Great Preparations for War made by Rodrigo, in all the parts of his Dominions.

Dodrigo being dejected, as I have newly faid, at this first loss, knew not what course to take to hinder the progress of the Enemies, and with whatever hopes those of his Council and Court would needs flatter him, he was not capable of receiving any Confolation. fo full had his Heart been of anxiety for some time, and pre-posses'd with the ill Opinion he had of the fuccess of this War. He was not wanting however to use all possible Diligence, and omitted nothing of what he thought could help to free him out of fo great a danger, for he was but too fenfible. that he it was, particularly, that so horrible a Tempest threatned.

Wherefore he caus'd the Troops he had levy'd in all the Provinces of his Kingdom to advance from all parts, and gave them a general Rendezvouze at Cordona, where of late he kept his Court; that so he might send them from thence to such places as should need them, and be the readier to take such courses as his occasions should require.

His Orders were fo well Executed. that in a little time his Army was found to be fourfcore thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse; all of 'em People huddled indeed together, and most of em without Arms and Experience. He gave them for their General the Arch-bishop D. Oppas, his very near Relation; whom he fent before with thirty thousand Foot, and fix thousand Horse, to try Fortune once again against Tariff, and endeavour to take the Count D. Julian, imagining, that as he had the Secret and Conduct of this Enterprize, it was, doubtless, the most compendious way to put an end to the War.

In the mean while fresh reinforcements came every minute to Tariff, Muca caus'd the two Armies that were lest behind in Africa, to file daily into Spain, as well that which Hiza had brought from Arabia, as that which Prince Prince Mahomet Gilhair had brought from Tunis: But as they came by little and little, and separately, it could not otherwise be but that there must be some Disorder. Tariff, to prevent the being surprized in the hurry of Landing, and to draw his Troops up in Battel array accordingly as they descended from their Ships, refolv'd to take more ground, and a little farther in the Country to choose a place sufficiently spacious for the Encampment of his whole Army, and in fecurity wait the coming of D. Rodrigo: Wherefore he advanc'd as far as the River which the Arabs call * Guidalete, at the same * Tisthe time that the Archbishop D. Oppas came River calthither, and fent to propose to him a led Guida-Truce for eight days, to give the two Armiestime to recover themselves after the fatigues of the March. The Archbishop, who doubtless was not inform'd of the state of the Enemies Army, imagin'd this Truce would turn to his advantage, by giving his own time to encrease. But in the mean while, all those Troops that Tariff had caus'd to file off, according as they landed, being come, they made up Sixty Thousand Foot, and Ten Thousand Horse, at the review review he made of them after the Truce was expir'd. Oppas perceiving the fault he had committed, and fearing that the King would reproach him with having given the Enemies time to join all their Forces, and fortify their Campi he resolv'd to give them Battel without any farther delay. The reinforcement he had receiv'd, join'd with what he had before, made not up above Forty Thoufand Men: Yet was he not wanting with these to push the Moors so vigorously, that Tariff was constrain'd to retire. after having lost Three Thousand Foot, and about Five Hundred Horse: Whereas the Christians lost no more in this action, than Two Thousand Foot. and Two Hundred Horse. The Night having parted them, Oppas also retreated into his own Camp, to let his Souldiers take Breath, before he renew'd the Conflict. The number of the Wounded being very great on both fides, Oppas fent to propose a Truce to Tariff, for three days, which was forthwith concluded on between the two Generals. Things being in this estate, the following Night, a Traytor (for fo he may well be call'd, fince he fold his own Countrey) stole out of the Christians Camp, into that of the Arabs. This Man being the Companion of Oppas, and call'd Sisebert, went to tell Tariff, that the King D. Rodrigo's General, had only demanded this Truce. that he might furprize him that Night. and put him by that means the more easily to rout. Tariff affording Credence to this notice, upon the account of the eminent Quality of the person that brought it, (tho it was an imposture, as was afterwards verify'd) thought it became him to prevent his Enemy, and without waiting till he had put himself in a posture to execute his evili intentions, he made his Souldiers stand immediately to their Arms, and caus'd them to march directly to the Christians Camp, where they fell on with fo much impetuofity, that they forc'd it, put the whole Army to rout, took General Oppas, with the Principal Officers, Prisoners, and got an inestimable Booty, and an infinity of Slaves.

After this Victory, Tariff made great presents to Sifebert, and retreated near to the Guadalette, into the Quarters he had before, and which he had found very convenient for the Subfistance of his Army.

CHAP. IX.

Muca passes into Spain, and joins with Tariff. Rodrigo puts himself at the head of his Army, gives them Battel, and loses it.

Uca hearing daily of Tariffs great VI Victories, began no longer to doubt of the Conquest of Spain, whether he incessantly sent reinforcements of Souldiers, and Amunitions, and Provifions.

But not being with this contented, he resolv'd to pass the Sea in person, in the head of a fourth Army, so to share in the honour of so fine a Conquest. Wherefore he left to a Brother of his. call'd Ishmael, the Government of Africa, in his absence; and having with all possible diligence, got together twenty thousand Foot, and fix thousand Horse, brave Men, and well appointed; he went to join Tariff, who was very joyful at the thing.

When it came to be known that the Vice-roy had himself pass'd the Streights, there pass'd so great a number of Moors, being invited by the hopes of pillage, that in the review they made of all their Troops, they were found to be a hundred and fourfcore thousand Foot, and forty thousand Horse, besides an infinite number of useless people that are wont to accompany Armies.

Redrigo, who then exerted all the Duties of a great King, seeing the number of the Moors daily to augment, thought it in no wife convenient to give them time to fortifie themselves more: And having affembled his Council, to see what Resolution it became him to take in fo great an exigency; they unanimously agreed, That he could do nothing better than go himself in the head of his Army, give them Battel, rather sooner than later; and that all the Nobility, Gentry, and People of Service in Spain would not fail to attend him.

This Resolution being taken, the king having nominated for Generalissimo of all his Troops, his Favourite call'd the plain of Truth.

Almerique, a man very brave and refolute: a General review was held near Cordoua, in a Plain the Arabs shortly *It is now after nam'd Fahe Alguidah *, where was found twenty three thousand Horse, and a hundred and thirty thousand Foot. This Prince having caus'd the General Officers to come thither, and the most considerable of the Captains, gave them to understand the danger their Country was in that not only their Honour and their Estates, but their Life and Liberty depended on the good or ill fuccess of the Battel he was going to fight: that after this Action there was no more fuccours to be expected from their Country, that was exhausted by the late Defeats; that they had no longer any hopes but in their own Valour; that they had only to confider whether they should not rather chuse to dye generously, in fighting for their Country, than to fall themselves, their Families and Children, into a perpetual Slavery *, and be a Prey to foreign * Dimiin. Nations, and so different from them in Manners and Religion, that he faid not this to them, to expose them alone to the peril, with a defign to shelter himfelf from it; that he should be the first to shew them the way and example; and that he did not believe there to be any man that made a difficulty of going with his King, when they should see him resolv'd to dye with them, and for them.

The Souldiers being encourag'd by this discourse, and resolv'd to dye for their King and Country, having had order to march against the Enemies, there happen'd a remarkable thing, and and of an ill augure, which was that D. Ramiro, Alfier Major of King Rodrigo; being mounted on Horieback, his Horse gave him so terrible a fall, that he dy'd of it, and the Launce broke in two, to which the Royal Standard * was fasten'd.

Those who saw so sudden a Death, * Atiar, were a little terrify'd; but Rodrigo Prodigy. having given the Colours * to another, * Badr. continued his march to the River Gar- Cornet. dalete, where he encamp'd in fight of Tariff, in a Plain very proper for the ranging all his Troops in Battalia.

The day following, the King sent one of the bravest men of his Army, call'd Thodomir, with five hundred Horse, and two hundred Foot, all choice men, and well arm'd, to view the Enemies. Tariff fail'd not to detach out at the same time, five hundred Moors, and three hundred Julianists, having in the head of them Abraham Abenabis, who began so bloody. and so obstinate a Combat, that it lasted from Three a Clock in the Afternoon, till Night *, which constrained ner till the them to part, leaving it undecided Evening which had the advantage; the dead and wounded being much the fame on

> The King, whose heart was puft up with the fuccess of this Skirmish, having held a Council in the Evening, and propos'd to the principal Officers of his Army, to give Battel on the morrow, it was refolv'd on, and a Herald fent to fignify it to Tariff, who accepted it.

In the midst of October, in the year 714.

It was on the third Wednesday of the month of Maharran, in the year 94 of the Hegira, that this Battel was fought, which began at break of day, and cost both Parties a great deal of Blood: For the Christians in this action lost their General Almerique, with about three thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse, and the Moors a thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse.

by the Moors. Rodrigo was extreamly afflicted for Cabra, the Death of Almerique; for he had that day perform'd Heroick actions, and shown he was not only a good Souldier, but a great Captain. And indeed, he it was alone, that had put the Camp of the Moors to disorder; among whom he broke in with fo much bravery, that he was kill'd upon the spot; and after his death, the Christian Army wanted little of being totally defeated.

And indeed, Rodrigo found it convenient to go and encamp fix Leagues from thence, the more fafely to deliberate on what he had to do. Whereupon he made his Retreat in the best order imaginable; by these means abandoning the Field of Battel to Tariff, who on his fide, caus'd all the dead, both Moors and Christians, to be buried, for fear the Corruption of their Bodies might occasion some Distempers in his Camp. But as foon as he heard Rodrigo was retired, taking his Retreat for a flight, he march'd after him with all Expedition, and overtook him on the Friday following; when the Conflict ** Malhabeing renew'd, it lasted from Noon till ma, Battel, Night, which parted them, without either

The Conquest of Spain either parties having the occasion to boast of the advantage. What most afflicted General Tariff, was, that Prince Mahomet Gilhair, the King of Thunis Son, and Count Julian, were both dangerously wounded in this action, and the later particularly of three great wounds. On the other fide, Rodrigo being paul'd by the oppofition of the Enemies, found that all he had been thitherto able to do, was but a small matter, and desponding of his being capable of doing any thing more hereafter, he knew not what to determine upon; and all the courses propos'd to him, seeming to him equally bad and dangerous, he chose rather to leave the Decision of Fortune to the day following, than to wait it any longer, having taken a stedsast resolution to Conquer then or Dye.

Whereupon having marshall'd all his Forces in the best order he could, he led them to the Enemies with great vigour, and was by them receiv'd with so much bravery and firmness, that there dy'd that day fifteen hundred Foot, and two hundred and fifty Horse, of the Christians, and fifteen hundred Moors, in all, as well Horse as Foot. As for the wounded, on both fides, the number of them fcatter'd up and down, was fo great, that they were not reckon'd *. The Battel having been de- * Mudmia, ferr'd till the Wednesday following, by Bloody. the consent of both parties, it began again at break of day, but not with the same obstinacy. For in short, Rodrigo seeing his Men stagger, threw himself into the midst of the fray, to re-inspire them with Courage, and did all he could to rally them; but the defeat being absolute, and without remedy *, he forbid the few people he had * Dia, about him, to follow him; and he Hopes. left his Camp, without its being known what became of him.

All the Christians being thus, or dead, or prisoners, or put to flight; all the Riches of their Camp, wherein there was abundance, became the booty of the Conquerours. But Tariff, without fuffering his Souldiers to trifle away their time in plunder, and without allowing them one days rest, march'd directly to Cordona, which he took without its costing him one man; and encamp'd all his Troops in the neighbourhood of the Town, in such manner as he judg'd most fitting to refresh them

The Conquest of Spain them, after so many fatigues; and to give the wounded time to be cur'd of their wounds.

Ariff reckon'd for nothing, all these Battels he had won, since Rodrigo had escap'd him; and did not think Spain was ever conquer'd, unless he had him in his hands, For which reason, he had Proclamation made throughout his Army, That whosoever, either Moor or Christian, should deliver him up alive, or dead; he would not only grant * him great Promise. Franchizes and Exemptions, but wherewithal to live at his ease the rest of his days. The hopes of such great gains, set several Christians, Moors, and Renegadoes, upon the hunt, throughout all Andalousia, to enquireaster the King.

At last, some of them questing in the Mountains and Lands thereabouts, at a distance saw a Shepherd in a very rich garb, being the same that unhappy Prince was wont to wear. With great joy did they run after him to catch him, and brought him immediately to the General, who having caus'd Count Julian to come to view him, he was found to be a very fimple and ignorant Swain, from whom they could hardly get a word, and much less information of what they were in quest. He told them he knew nothing else of what they demanded, but that as he was keeping his flock upon the Mountain where they had taken him, he had feen coming towards him, upon a Horse very much tir'd, and that feem'd out of Breath, a man, in the Cloaths he at present wore, who, with a furious voice, and frightful countenance, had bid him pull off forthwith a Coat lin'd with Sheep-skin he had then on; that accordingly having stript himself immediately, he had caus'd him

by the Moors.

Tariff left her in her Palace, without suffering any one to enter therein, to commit the least Diforder; he only made fure of her Person as well as the Palace: And as this great City could not be kept without a great number of Troops, he thought fitting to leave there Prince Mahomet Gilhair, as well for the containing 'em in their Duty, as for the recovering his perfect health, for he was not yet well cur'd of his Wounds, nor recover'd from the fatigues of this War. He plac'd about this Prince the Moor, Abulcacim Hadilbar, to affift him with his Council in Military Expeditions, in case such occasions should be offer'd; and after having given his Orders, he divided his Troops into two equal Armies, one of which he left to the Vice-roy Muca, to go into the Western part of Andaloufia, and took the other to go into the more Southern, call'd Grenada; so to leave nothing behind them, when they had a mind to enter into the Province of Castile, which is separated from Andalousia on the Eastern side by a great Defart, compos'd of Mountains and . Lands, him to take those fine Cloaths in lien of his own; and that having afterwards ask'd him if he had any thing to eat in his Scrip, he had given him a little Bread he had lest. After which, the Unknown having taken his Crook, commanded him to come shew him the way; which he did, putting him in a little path that went upwards, which he saw him mount, till he lost sight of him.

Tariff was not satisfy'd with this News, for after having discours'd the People of the Country of the place where the Shepherd had seen Rodrigo, he understood he was gone towards Castile; insomuch that he lost hopes of finding him, and bent his thoughts wholly upon taking all the advantages he might derive from his Victory.

Queen Zahra Beneliaza was at Cordoua, at the taking of that Town; and the she had time enough, before the Defeat of her Husband, to make her escape into Castile, she had not done so, either that she had been surprized by Tariff's Diligence, or for want of Refolution, and improving her time; or rather, in short, through the ill luck those labour under, whom Fortune Lands, which the Spaniards call Sierra Morena. This Resolution being taken, those two Generals directed their March each his own way, and Mahomet Gilhair staid with Queen Zahra.

CHAP. XI.

The Amours of Mahomet Gilhair with the Queen, who induces him to turn Christian, and then Marries him.

Before they departed from Cordona, Tariff fail'd not to do what is commonly done by Conquerours; who change the manner of the Government of the Cities they take, and there Establish such Laws as they please. He seiz'd on the great Church, and of some others which he turn'd into Moschs; leaving some to the Christians, for the exercise of their Religion. And after having caus'd great Fortifications to be made around that Town, which he consider'd as the Metropolis of Spain;

he particularly encharg'd Prince Gilhair to have great respect for Queen Zahra Beneliaca, and so to order matters, that she might be as little as possible sensible of her Captivity; representing to him, that being by Nation an Arabian, and a near Relation of Almanzor, his Master; so nigh that Mahomet Abnehedim, her Father, had shar'd Africa with him; they ought all to treat her as their real Queen, to endeavour to make her again espouse the Manners and Religion of her Forefathers; which there was a likelihood she would not find it a difficult matter to resolve on, feeing she must needs be inclin'd thereto, by the sentiments of Nature. The Unfortunate Gilhair did but too faithfully acquit himself of this Commission; for he saw her so often, and render'd her so many services, that as she was Young and Beautiful, and he Gallant and Witty, he became desperately in Love with her. Nothing now but Feafts and Merriments at Cordona, he daily invented something new to divert and please her, and his thoughts were wholly taken up in making her a thousand presents, wherein there was ever as much gallantry as magnificence: As

As he had all the conveniency of feeing her he could desire, the respect he bare her, had long hinder'd him from declaring his passion to her. But this at length being become the strongest, he could not forbear giving her to understand, in a thousand conversations he had with her, that if she would again espouse the Religion in which she had been brought up, he would bring her back into her own Countrey, with the Crown of Thunis, which he would put upon her Head, instead of that of Castile. which she had lost. Every time he discours'd her upon this point, she pretended she did not understand him: but he imagin'd it to be an uneafiness of hers, in suffering a Declaration of Love, that hinder'd her from answering; and that he had to vanquish rather her modesty than her aversion. At length, they two only being together one day, and he thinking her dispos'd to be more favourable to him, he threw himself at her feet, and conjur'd her not to leave him any longer in the uncertainty of his good or evil fortune; and at last, resolve upon pronouncing the word that was to give him his death, or to render him happy all his life long. The

The Queen not hating him, would not suffer him any longer to flatter himself with vain hopes: Wherefore she declar'd to him, the was refolv'd to live and dye in the Faith * she had embrac'd; * Hyomen, but that if the defire he express'd to her of marrying her, was as strong as he would fain perswade her, and if he imagin'd it so easie a matter to change Religion, he would find no difficulty in doing for her, what he proposed to her, to do for him; that instead of prefsing her to turn Mahometan, he needed only to turn Christian; and that upon this condition, she would consent to a match, wherein there was nothing unworthy of her Royal extraction *. After *Fack AL this answer, the Prince went his ways Blood home very pensive, but he was not capa-Royal. ble to refift his passion long. They were neither of them in a place to folemnize this Marriage, which was quickly agreed on ; and the juncture of times was not propitious: For which reason, the Princess caus'd one of her * Religious to come, without the least notice * Calch, being taken out being taken out, and marry her in pri-ous. vate with the Prince, after he had baptiz'd him. The Ceremonies were perform'd with all possible secresie *, and Mubs. Gilhair convert.

Gilhair and Zahra enjoy'd their A. mours peaceably for some time, carefully concealing the Images they ador'd in private. But they could not keep their intelligence so secret, but that it. was discover'd by one of the Queens Ladies, in whom she confided: She was born in Arabia, of the number of those that, had been thrown upon the Coasts of Spain, with the Queen, and who with her were converted. This Woman, call'd Sigebeste, having been perswaded * by some Moors, had betaken herself again to her ancient Religion; insomuch, that having seen Mahomet make profession of Christiania ty with the Queen, in her Palace. she resolv'd, tho with trouble, to inform Abulcacim Adilbard how matters went, whom Tariff had left with that Prince, in all things to affift him, with his Council. Aldilbar was extreamly afflicted at the tydings, and would by no means believe the least on't for a long time; imagining this Woman might perchance, have a grudge to the Prince, for some particular reason *. But false testi-making reflexion upon the greatness of the passion he had long observ'd this Prince have for the Queen, he began to believe him capable of all.

He had then the curiofity, to fathom the thing, without making femblance of ought; and knew at length so well to observe his actions, that without the Queens suspecting it, he discover'd all that had pass'd between therfi. When he was throughly assur'd, he went to the Army, where he acquainted Tariff with the particulars of this Intrigue.

Tariff was surprized and perplexed at the same time, for he consider'd that Mahomet Gilhair being no Vassal of Almanzor, but the Son of a Prince as Potent as himself, and his Ally, who came to affift him voluntarily with his Forces in this War *; however, just the * 12ifr.65, resentment that ought to be had against Conqueste him for so great a rashness, it might be attributed to some jealousie, or to some particular ill will, which might make him incurr the Disfavour of his Master. Wherefore he contented himself with. sending Adilbar back to Cordona, with a reinforcement of Troops, to confine the Queen, Prince Mahomet, and all those he should believe to have had a hand in his evil designs *; and gave * Almubb-

But they would in no wife consent thereto; and declard that they rather chose to suffer the Death with which they were threatned, and which they were ready to receive, than renounce the Faith they had Embrac'd. Adilbar, both surprized and provoked at this obstinacy, caus'd them all three to be beheaded; and their Bodies were a long time abandon'd in the place, in the midst of the dirt; from whence they were taken by the Christians, who bury'd them the best to their ability, tho not according

CHAP. XII.

Tariff makes himself master of the Province of Grenada, and of the Snowy Mountains, call'd by the Spaniards of the Sun, and of the Air.

obey'd; for that he was very fevere, and did not willingly fuffer Omissions in the Executing his Commands; his Souldiers feeing themselves in a Land of Conquest, did not however refrain from committing some Insolencies.

At last, at a distance he perceiv'd a City built upon a Hill, from whence one had the Prospect of the most pleafant and most fertile Plain imaginable, and that had the air of the Terrestrial Paradice.For it was all about furrounded with little Mounts, full of Trees and Springs, and cut by a large and deep River, that pass'd in the midst of a great extent of Meadows, all fow'd with Flowers. Those he sent to view it, having brought him word that it had good Walls and good Towers, he Encamp'd in the midst of that Plain, that his Forces might take Breath, and that he might at his leifure see where it was to be attack'd with most success. But no fooner had he begun the Approaches in the forms, than that the Inhabitants, seeing the few men they had to oppose against so great a strength, and having no hopes of fuccours, being inform'd of the Defeat of their King, after having long conferr'd together about the means of securing their freedom, they refolv'd upon fending to offer Tariff to surrender up the Town. provided he suffer'd them and their Families to enjoy in Peace all their Goods and Estates, and remain in their Country without Oppression * in their Perfons, or Violence done them in their Religion.

Tariff having held a Council, accepted their Offers: and promis'd to cause the Conditions carefully to be observ'd, upon which they were willing to put their Town into his hands. The Articles of the Capitulation were drawn up * Betis A- by them, and figned by this General, who fwore in the Name of Almanzor punctually to observe them: And thus, without its costing him so much as one † This is man, he entred Grenada with part of what the his Army; and plac'd as Governour. one of his Captains, call'd Betis Abecall Surra nabur*, born in Arabia Fælix. He only cross'd this Town, that so he might at the same time reduce the tain, and Mountains which cover it on the South: the Arabs these the Christians call the Mountains from the of the Sun and of the Air t, by reason they are in the Middle Region: For corrupted, he had been told that the Peasants being brave resolute fellows, resolv'd to defend them; relying upon the little knowledge the Moors had of their Country, wherein it was impossible to penetrate very far with an Army.

Tariff. who hitherto had not found any obstacle in his Conquests, no not even in the City of Grenada, where he expected to have met with some refistance, confided in his wonted fuccess, and the Resolution of his Souldiers; and imagin'd that this little corner of Earth being only defended by Bumpkins, would not hold out longer than the other Places where he had pass'd.

But when he was at a great Ravine, It is not making a Torrent that falls into a Ri-known what this ver, which the Christians call Auzeva, Ravine is, cr being oblig'd to stop there, about mid-Par de Toc, night the Peasants came and attack'd unless it be the his Camp with so much fury, that he bridge of was forced to abandon it, after having Tabalate.
The Moors there lost four thousand Foot, and some have since Horse. On the morrow, being enrag'd call'd this to have been thus beaten by Bumpkins, Rive he refolved to be Reveng'd on 'em, and to attack 'em, as he did, in the same place. But the Christians defended them-themselves with as much vigour as the day before, and without lofing hardly one of their fide, they kill'd fifteen hundred more of his Men. What enrag'd him most, was the difficulty of the Country, where the Cavalry, wherein confifted his greatest strength, could not penetrate; whereas these Peasants, from the advantageous Posts they possess'd, made a great slaughter of his Men, without his being able to come at them: Whereupon he was upon the point of defifting from his Enterprize, where he only lost time and Souldiers, and to carry his Arms elsewhere, when that one of those Mountainers called Fandino, to secure a little Estate he had in that Canton, came and shew'd him a place, by which he might come and enter with the Horse into the heart of the Country, and easily fubdue it: The General was overjoy'd, and having ask'd this Peasant a thousand Questions *, to which he made pertinent answers; by his advice he drew off his Troops four miles from the place where they lay, and having given order to his Fleet to draw near that Coast, he detach'd one of his most Valiant Captains, call'd Abraham Abuxarra, buxarra, with ten thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, to a place call'd Xat, by the Arabs, where he Shipp'd him with all his Men, and Fandino, whom he sent along to serve him for his Guide; Abraham was not long before he arriv'd at a Town upon the Eastern Coast of Spain by the Christians, call'd * Adrada, and in good order * It is at entred the heart of the Country, pilla-Adra. ging, and laying all waste.

The Christians had no Cavalry, and expected no fuccours, seeing themselves shut up on all sides, Abuxarra attacking them behind, while Tariff beat them before, yet made not any movement, by which we could perceive the Extremity they were reduc'd to: But after being affembled to see what course was best for them to take, they resolv'd to send to demand a Truce ** colcb, for fifteen days of Tariff, that so Truce. they might have time to concert with him the Conditions on which they were willing to furrender.

Tariff having immediately accepted the offers they made him, and having given a safe Conduct * for such as they * Amr, were minded to send as Deputies to Thing. him; they chose the Bishop of that Country,

Country, call'd Otoger, with some other Persons of Credence, whom they sent into the Camp with the necessary Powers. He was a man of Wit and Learning, and very Expert and knowing in affairs. He was very kindly receiv'd by Tariff, who immediately struck up with him in the following Conditions: That the Christians should remain in that Country if so minded, and should not be molested either in their Persons, or Estates, or their Consciences: That they should not pay any other Imposts, than the Tribute they were wont to pay to Christian Kings That if any among them were not willing to stay there, they should be suffer'd to sell their whole Estate, and and go into whatever Country, inhabited by Christians, they should best like.

This Capitulation being fign'd by Tariff, in the name of the Great Almanzor his Master, in whose name he promis'd to observe it very exactly; Abra-*It is now ham Abuxarra * was left there as Gofill call'd vernour: And as he was the first that entred the Country, and had been its first Governour, this little Province was from this time call'd by his name.

This General having now totally reduc'd those parts that fell to his lot. re-assembled all his Forces to return to Cordoua, by the same way he came, with a Design to rejoin Muca, after that to enter both together, and without any longer delay, into the Province of Castile.

CHAP. XIII.

The Conquests of Muca, and his return to Cordoua.

▲ T the same time that General Tariff began his march, to lead his Army towards the East and South, into the Province of Grenada, as we have faid, the Vice-roy Muca went to lead his towards the West, into the Province which the Natives of the Country call Andalousia, from the name of certain People, that formerly inhabited it, call'd Vandals. He march'd at first against Carmona, a small Town indeed, but well fortify'd; where feveral Christians had taken refuge, from all the Burroughs, and all the Villages of that Country, which they had forsaken at Muca's Approach, and where they had stor'd themselves with all forts of Ammunition and Provisions, that so they might defend themselves as long as possible they could.

The Vice-roy having block'd it up on all fides, the Befieged refolv'd to make a Sally out of the strongest of their Gates, and with the best men they had, to see if there was any posfibility of defeating their Enemies, before they had better fortified them-

Wherefore on the morrow at break of day, having taken Arms, and encouraged one another to do well, they attack'd the Moors Camp with fo much Bravery, and in fuch good order, that they kill'd three hundred of them before they could know, and put themfelves in a posture of Defence, and return'd into the Town, having lost but five and twenty on their side.

This fuccess having puft up their Hearts, they would needs fee the day * rehadad following, if Fortune * would be as favourable to them. But having found the Moors upon their Guard, they were received a little more fmartly than the day before, and constrained to return into the Town faster than they came thence. The Moors pursu'd them so closely, that the Governour of Carmona fearing that by opening the Gates to receive them, the Enemies would enter pell-mell with them, and so make themselves masters of the Place; he found it more expedient to let the few Christians that were without to be lost. than to lose the Town in endeavouring to fave them; and forbid the opening to them the Gate, he fear'd it would be no longer in his power to shut.

The Christians seeing the Resolution their Governour had taken, all on the fudden took a very generous one; for having all engag'd rather to dye, like Men of Courage, than be made saves, they fac'd about upon those that purfued them, and fighting like Desperate People, kill'd eight hundred of them, and push'd on into the midst of Muca's Camp, where they were all kill'd upon the spot, or taken Prisoners, without so much as one of them escaping. Muca being very much enrag'd at these two bad successes, affembled the Principal Officers to hold a Council of War, wherein it was refolv'd on the morrow morning to make a General attacque. The Ladders were set up against the Walls, and the Moors mounted them with great Resolution: On the other side, the Beleaguer'd defended themselves with great firmness, Killing and Topsy-turvying those that mounted. Among others, the Governour of the Place, call'd Galo, did then perform Heroick Actions; for he alone, with two men he had with him, defended a whole Courtine, from one Tower to another. which he had undertaken to maintain; and with a Cross-bow, kill'd or wounded for his own part that day himself alone fourscore Moors. This Conflict lasted from Noon till Night and in it the Vice-roy lost fifteen hundred men; whereas the Besieged, as we were afterwards inform'd, lost but three hundred.

The time and men Muca lost before this Place, made him resolve, for the rendring himself master of it, to try another way than that of force, which he had sped so ill in thitherto. Whereupon he sent to summons the Besieged to surrender, offering not only to spare their Lives, but to grant them great Priviledges, if they made their Composition sooner than later. This Proposal caus'd the Besieged to open their Eyes, and the Principal of them assembling to confer with their Governour; they concluded, that tho they should still hold out for a while, their * Provisions would at length fail * Zid, Athem, and their Souldiers would di-munitiminish; that all that Province was almost subdu'd, that they could not expect fuccours from any body, that thus fooner or later they would be a Prey to the Victorious: For which reason, they made answer, That they were content to open him the Gates of their City, provided he would fuffer them to depart thence with their Wives and Children, and all they had of Money, Arms and Baggage, and generally all things whatever that they could carry along with them, whither they pleas'd, with full freedom.

by the Moors.

All that they required was granted them, bating the Baggage; upon which they were told, That they might only carry away with them, what they could load upon a hundred Waggons, with which they were contented.

Thus

Thus all the Christians departed, and went to another City near the Sea, call'd His pala in their Tongue, while that Muca, after having plac'd a Governour there, with fome Souldiers, for Guard, decamp'd forthwith to march towards a very great and populous City, which the Spaniards in their Tongue call Merida.

The Conquest of Spain

In this Town there was a very brave Christian Governour, and as he Signaliz'd himself in this Siege, and therein perform'd Actions worthy of Praise, he well deserves that I should dwell a little longer upon the Relation of his Performances.

This Governour, call'd Salara, feeing the havock made by the Moors Army in the Countries where it pass'd, caus'd all the Christians in the Neighbourhood of Merida to retire into that Town. with their Wives and Children, and caus'd them to bring along with them, all the Victuals there was in the Country; where having left only what could not be remov'd, he himself sent fome to burn all the Villages thereabouts, and to make a havock throughout all the Country, that so when the Moors should come thither, they might find nothing left. He did not content himself with this, he caus'd all the Waters to be poyfon'd, and having employ'd all the Peasants, he caus'd em to work upon the Fortifications of the Town: He repair'd its Walls, its Battlements and Parapets: And having caus'd a Review to be made of what men he had in a condition to fight, he found 'em five thousand strong, whom he distributed into the Towers, and other Places he judg'd convenient. Things were in this posture when the Vice-roy drew near the Place, and having block'd it up on all sides, began by fending to Summons Salaru to Surrender, otherwife that he would put all that were in it to the Sword.

But the Governour having made him Answer, That he might do as he pleas'd; That the Mercy of God was greater than his Forces, and that it afforded him more Confidence than all his Threatnings gave him Fear.

Muca being provok'd at this Refusal, caus'd all things to be prepar'd for the making the Assault. The next day the Moors being mounted to the Scalade, were there receiv'd, and vigoroufly repuls'd by the Beleaguer'd, by means of the great order, with which they ran to the * relief of one another upon occasion. The Attack lasted the whole day, wherein the Besiegers lost fix hundred Men, and the Besieged only fifty seven. But the Moors having renew'd the fight the next morning at break of day, that they might afford the Besieged no respite it was so obstinate and furious, that the Town had like to have been taken at unawares. The Moors having already got to the top of the Wall, and being ready to leap into the Town, when that Salaru, who went to all the places that had need of his Succours, running thither just in the nick, tumbled them down from the top of the Walls, and by this means deliver'd Merida, that but for him had been now taken; obliging the Besiegers to retire with the loss of eight hundred men, whereas he had lost but about three hundred.

The Vigour the Christians had exerted in these two Conslicts, did a little cool that of the Vice-roy, who resolv'd to quarter all his Army round the place, and see if he could not take it by Famine. Salaru having perceiv'd his Design, made a very exact review of all that was in the Town, that he might more duly fee how long his Victuals could last. He found there to be several useless Mouths, in Women, Children, and Old Men, that were past bearing of Arms, and yet consum'd the Provisions, that began already to diminish, tho there had been as yet but thirty days Siege, and that they had laid up great stores before-hand. He also faw it to be impossible for him to hold out much longer, and not being ftrong enough to stir out of the enclofure of the Town to fight the Enemies, he bethought himfelf of employing Stratagem, to endeavour to make them raife the Siege. Wherefore he fent to Muca, That he was mistaken, if he thought, by Famine, to force him to Surrender: that he had still Bread enough for above ten years; and to make good his words, he caus'd a world of Baskets full of Loaves, to be thrown from off the Walls.

This Complement had like to have made Muca run mad, and he made no answer to it but by a General Assault, which lasted a whole day, with great vigour on both sides: for there sell above sive hundred Moors, without reckoning Captain Aliculeyman, who was very much wounded, which extremely afflicted Muca. It cost the Befieged little less, who also lost in this occasion four hundred men. But Muca having been oblig'd to cause the Retreat to be founded, by reason of the night, the next morning he fent a Trumpeter to the Governour, to fignifie to him, That he had made an Oath, and fworn by the most high God, that if the Beleaguer'd delay'd Surrendring any longer, they should after this, all to no purpose implore his Mercy.

Salaru having straitways assembled the principal men of the Town, gave them in a little time a very exact account of the state of the place; and after having made them apprehend the necessity they were in of all things, and the little likelihood he faw of being Reliev'd, they all agreed to Surrender, but upon the most advantageous Conditions they could get: Infomuch that they made him answer; That they would willingly put the Place into his hands, provided he would fuffer them, they, their Wives and Children, with their Arms and Baggage, to go to whatever City of the Christians they should please:

please; that all those that were minded to stay, should not receive any ill treatment, nor be constrain'd to quit their Religion. Muca agreeing to all these Articles, and having been induc'd to Sign 'em, and swear in the Name of the Caliph his Master, never to act to the contrary, conceiv'd fuch an esteem of the Bravery and Fidelity of this Governour, and of his ability to take his Precautions, that he took a Scimitar of great value he had at his Girdle, and himself put it on his side, faying, That the Valour with which he had fav'd his People from so great a Danger, merited a thousand times more Honour than he did him.

Salaru having given him the Keys of the Town, where the Riff-raff only staid, he took all those along with him that were minded to follow him, with whom he went on Shipboard, to waft o're to the nearest Islands of that Coast, that he might not see the Ruine of his Country, and so shelter himself from the fervitude of the Arabians, under which * Quibar, he foresaw that all Spain was going to Servicude. be reduc'd.

The Vice-roy of Africa was overjoy'd at the taking of this great City, but but could not stay there long, for that there was no subsistance to be got out of the Country, that had been forsaken by the People, who had all taken refuge in the Province, call'd in the Spanish Tongue Castile, and had left this Country desert. For which reason. after having put a Garrison into the Place, he caus'd all his Troops to march towards Hispalis. They were not gone far, when that his Scouts came to give him notice, that the world of People that had taken refuge there, had occasion'd such a Contagion, that the mortality was general. This News put a full stop to his Career that way; and the fear he was in of caufing his Army to perish, made him return to Cordona, to rejoin Tariff, who had fignify'd to him, he was already on his way from Grenada thither.

CHAP. XIV.

The Conjunction of the two Generals, and their entrance into Castile.

Hese two Generals, being return'd from their Expedition, after having each on his fide acquir'd much Honour; did for a long while hold Council what courfe to take, for the finishing the absolute Conquest of Spain; for which they had receiv'd precife orders from Almanzor. During that time, the Souldiers being put into good Quarters, recover'd themselves of the Hardships of that War. The Officers repair'd their Equipages, which fo long a march had ruin'd; and the Commissioners not only receiv'd all the new Provisions that were come to them from Africa, but had also gather'd up on all fides, all that was necessary Athans, for the Invasion of Castile, according Provision to the resolution they had taken.

At last, the two Armies that now made but one Body, being decamp'd in the best order imaginable, march'd fmall days journeys, along a great River, which having its course towards the Setting Sun, croffes that Province; and after having wash'd the Walls of Cordona, at a great distance lower falls into the Ocean. Thus still on * Dan Cur- their Right leaving this River *. which the Christians call Betis, and the Arabs, Alguidalquibir; the first Town they found in their Left was Theda, whose Inhabitants brought them their Keys, as not being in a posture of making a Defence.

Tariff having on pain of Death, forbidden any entrance into the Town, without Express order; or in any wise, the injuring of People, that had thrown themselves into his Arms, did there only leave one Captain Abencorbas, with some Souldiers, and leisurely march'd to another Town, not three miles thence, call'd Balle. The Citizens feeing that if they paus'd at following the Example of Vbeda, they should but Exasperate the Moors, and incur their inevitable ruine, without any profit; they fent immediately to beseech this General, to hinder any mischief from being done them by his Souldiers; and in confideration of that, they would not only furrender to him, but likewise present him with all sorts of Victuals and Refreshments for his Troops.

mif-

Tariff very joyfully accepted their offers, and to manifest his Clemency to them, and the Discipline he caus'd his Army to observe, having forbidden any one soever to enter therein without his order, he himself, one after the other, nominated all those he was willing should accompany him thither, to the number of five hundred; with whom alighting, he took a turn round the Town, visited all the Fortifications, and left there a Natural African, call'd Mahomet Abencorba, with a pretty strong Garrison, for its Preservation. He staid no longer there than he had done at Vbeda, and pursu'd his way Northwards, acrossa vast pile of Mountains, that separate Andalousia from Castile, and stretch from the Mediterranean Sea to the Ocean. Thus having travers'd twenty miles, or thereabouts, they are in breadth, he descended into the Plains de la Manche, which the Arabs call the Dry Fields *; where ha- *Faye abis, in spanish vinggone near fixty miles without meeting with any body, all the People having quitted, and being retired into the heart of the Country; he at last discover'd a Town, which seem'd very beautiful to him, and much stronger than all those he had yet seen, and was told that it was Toledo, the Metropolis of Castile, where the Christian Kings had in all times made their abode. Along this City passes the famous River of Tage, which also disembogues into the Western Sea. And here it was King Rodrigo had caus'd the Enchanted Tower to be open'd, whereof I have made mention in the beginning of this History.

Tariff having Encamp'd all his Troops in the Neighbourhood, with intention to Besiege it, the Christians sent to tell him, That they had no thoughts of holding out; and that, provided he would suffer them to enjoy peaceably what they had, and permit all those that were so minded, to go where they pleas'd, with their Families, and all their Baggage, they would pay him all fort of Obedience, and would be as saithful to him, as they had thitherto been to their King.

This General having expected to have met with some opposition in this Place, was overjoy'd it did not oblige him to any stop; and swore solemnly in the Name of the Caliph Almanzar, his Master, for ever to observe the Conditions, on which they would put the Keys of so great a Town into his hands. He would needs also, for the maintaining it in the ancient Prerogative it had, of being the Capital City of fo great a Kingdom, leave there, as Governour, one of his principal Officers, call'd Mahomet Abenbamin, of the City of Damas, with the Quality of Vice-roy, and a Garrison he judg'd convenient.

It is a thing somewhat astonishing to be remark'd, that in near a hundred and sorty miles march, made by these two Generals, still skirting the Sea of the Levant, and drawing Northwards, they sound not one living Soul*, till * Mahalue, they came to a Province call'd Arragon, living in the midst of which there is a City Soul. call'd Saragoza, where several Christians had taken refuge, as well as in the Mountains next adjoyning, to shelter themselves from the sury of the Moors.

This City would needs stand out an Assault, that was bloody; after which it Surrendred upon very advantageous terms. Thus they staid there only the time requisite for the settling, as Governour of all that Province, a Captain of great Reputation, born in Arabia, call'd Ismael Abenbut; and resolved to push their Arms surther, and even beyond the Mountains the Christians call the Pyrenees, which separate the Kingdom of Spain from that of France.

The Conquest of Spain

They are very rugged and high; and the Christians were said to be retired thither, with a resolution of making a stout Defence. Nevertheless they advanced there about twenty miles, without meeting with any Refistance; infomuch that the Generals having made reflexion that their Master having only given them order to Conquer Spain, and France being a great Kingdom, wholly different, and wholly separate, it would be exceeding their Power, to push on their Invasion upon it. And feeing their Troops wearied with fo long a March, and much diminish'd by all the Garrisons they had been oblig'd to leave in the Towns they had taken; they resolved to go no further, and remitting the Conquest of France till another time, they thought it more convenient to return into Castile, to give the necessary orders for the conservation of what they had taken, and the reduction of what they had still left to take.

The March of the two Generals towards Valentia and Murtia, and their Return to Cordoua.

HE two Generals taking the Field again with their Forces, upon their departure from Arragon, bent their march towards the East, and continued it without any stay, to a great Plain, in the midst of which is a great City, enclos'd with good Walls; whence you have a Prospect of the Mediterranean Sea, that is but but sour small Leagues distant: All the Country adjacent is full of very delightful Gardens, Groves, and a world of springs, which form the finest Landskip imaginable.

Tariff,

courtesse.

Tariff, before he would begin the Siege, thought fitting to fend to fume mon the Inhabitants to Surrender, as all the other Cities of Spain had done! in confideration of which, he promised to fuffer em to live in Peace, according to their Law, and to hinder any injury from benig done them. But the Trumpeter coming near the City-gate, the Centinel that was upon the Wall, without hearkning to what he faid aloud, or insparting it to the Governour, let fly a Bullet from a Stone-Bow at him, by which the Trumpeter perceiving himself wounded, without staying any longer, came flying to the Camp. riff being provok'd at the little regard they had for a man that came from him. took this affair, not only for a want of respect * to him, but for an infraction of all the Laws of War, and the Right of Nations, and gave order for the Attacking the Town on all fides.

The next day the Governour, call'd Agres, having been inform'd of what the Centinel had done, was very much furprized at this mifunderstanding, and thought convenient to fend to make his excuse to Tariff, and propose to him at the same time a Truce for three days; during which, they would fee to contrive the means of making their Capitulation.

The Envoy of Valence was kindly neceiv'd by the General. The Truce was granted, and the Hostages having heen agreed on, he went out of the Town with full power to treat on the behalf of the Befieged, and came to Tariff's Camp, with whom he agreed to deliver him the Town, on Condition, that all the Christians that were minded to go thence, might have the freedom to to do, with their Wives and Children, and all their Goods, to whatever place they should please to choose. As also that all those that would stay there, might do it without being injur'd in the leaft. Tariff made no difficulty of granting them all they demanded, and of promiling to observe what he granted in the name of Almanzor his Master. In confideration of which, he made his entrance into that Town, and there left as Governour one of his Captains, a Native of Arabia Falix, nam'd Abubaxar Xandulg, whom he plac'd there with a numerous Garrison, to curb not only that Town, but the whole

whole Province depending on it.

After having thus fettled matters at Valence, Tariff and Muca, having bent their march a little more towards the South, entred the Province, by the Spaniards call'd Murtia; where having met with no relistance, they render'd themselves Masters of the Capital City.

that goes by the same name. Finding it forsaken by the Inhabitants, and the Country very good, they resolv'd upon settling there a part of the Souldiers of their Army, for the re-peopling it, and therein to put as Governour, Abraham Alexandri, by Nation an African. These two Armies being by these means reduc'd to a very scanty num-the way, both for Guarding and Populating all the Towns where they had pass'd, they return'd to Cordona, to reber, and by leaving fo many upon create themselves after the satigues of this War.

HE Governour of Cordona; Abulxacim by name, knowing the coming of the two Generals, went out to meet them four Leagues from that Town, with all the Foot and Horse in Arms he had, and accompany'd them in the Triumphant Entrance they made into that Place. During the abode they had occasion to make there, to recover themselves after the Hardships of so long and painful a War, they apply'd themselves carefully to regulate the form of Government of the Countries they had Conquerd. But above all things, they judg'd it in no wife safe for them, to suffer the Christians to remain Masters of so considerable a Town as Hispalis. I have noted in the beginning of this Hiftory, that the Siege of this Town had not been undertaken, for fear of bringing the Pestilence into the Army: Wherefore a trufty man was fent on purpose into those parts, to see how matters stood: who having brought word back. That the Contagion was there more rife than ever, and that an infinite number of Persons dy'd of it, it was judg'd requisite to leave it still alone. and that it would be fufficiently destroy'd by this Scourge of Heaven, without there being any need to infect it likewise with that of War.

One thing on which they found themselves oblig'd to think preserable to all others, was to recompence Count Julian, for the great Services he had done to Valid. They had promis'd him to cause his Castle of Algebrees to be * Rebuilt, and to Repair and Reestablish his other Lands and Lordfhips, that had been ruin'd by the passage he had given through them, to all the Forces that came out of Africa into Spain. Insomuch that they caus'd great summs of Money to be given him, and granted great Franchizes and Priviledges to all his Relations and Followers. Whereupon he took his leave of them, to repair home to fet

After this, they fell in good earnest to consider of regulating and policying their new Kingdom, and of re-populating that great Country that was become a Desert, by the flight of all the Inhabitants. Wherefore feeing that the Moors they had left in Garrison in the Cities and Burroughs where they had pass'd, had no Wives, tho they were all very Young, and that it was impossible to furnish them with enough from Africa, whence their Fathers and Mothers would never confent to suffer them to depart; they caus'd Proclamation to be made by found of Trumpet, throughout all Spain, That all the Christian Women and Maidens, as well of the ancient Inhabitants, as of whatever Nation they were, that were willing to be Converted, and Marry themselves to the Conquerours, should enjoy the same Priviledges and Prerogatives which they enjoy'd before. They caus'd at the same time, another Declaration to be Published in favour of the Gentlemen, to whom they offer'd I 2

the Dividend of the Conquer'd Lands.

This Publication in a short time, either out of sear or interest, caus'd an infinite number of Christians to change their Religion, and the Women and Maidens to resolve upon matching themselves with the Moors. At that time was it that the Arch-bishop of Oppas, who had been General of Rodrigo's Army, that Tariff had beaten and taken Prisoner in the second Battel, that had been sought near the River Guadalete, as I have said; and the Arch-bishop Toriso, a very near Relation of that Unhappy King, abjur'd their Faith to comply with Tariff and Muca. These two new Moors, to manifest their Zeal, and acquire still their Faith to * comply with Tariff and Muca. These two new Moors, to manisest their Zeal, and acquire still more credit than they had with the Generals, represented to them, that to hinder the Christians from revolting for the suture, or retrieving Courage with time, it was expedient throughly to clear all the Mountains on the Lest Hand of Arragon, in Spanish call'd Biscaye, and the Asturies; where they gave them notice that several Persons of great Quality had made their Retreat with a great number of Souldiers; nay, and that there was at the head of them fuch Persons as were Princes of the Blood of Spain, and D. Rodrigo's near Relations; without which their Conquest would never be secure.

This advice jump'd wholly with Tariff's fence, who gave immediate order to a Tartar, a very good Officer, Abraham le Sujari by name, to take fix thousand men of the Forces he had by him, and likewise to draw as many as he should need out of the Garrifons of Castile, and to march with the twc. Renegado-Arch-bishops, into the afore-mention'd Mountains.

At that time a Young Prince, a Kinfman of the K. D. Rodrigo, call'd Pelage, was retir'd thither with a good number of resolute men, that were willing to sollow his Fortune; and as he was brave, and pretended to the Crown, all the Christians that had taking resuge in the Mountains, had elected him King; and certainly he made himself appear to be very worthy of that Supream Dignity.

General Abraham being come near Fabpalia the Austuries, and encamp'd in a place fegal, in call'd Cangas by the Christians, and Spanish, which the Moors since nam'd the Term contiendus.

of War, thought convenient to fend the two Arch-bishops to him; having brought them along with him, that so being his Relations and Friends, they might the more eafily perswade him to defift from the Temerity of his Enterprize; with orders to offer him fuch Presents, and propose such advantages to him, as they should judge convenient, as well as to all the Christians that should be with him. Whereupon these Arch-bishops being come into the Country, and offering to make this Proposal to Pelage, he was so provok'd at them, that he had them feiz'd on, and both thrown from off the top of a Rock, into a River that was at the bottom. And as he had first been inform'd by them of the Scituation of Abraham's Camp, and the number of his Forces, he affembled what men he had, and went to attack them that very fame Night: And after having defeated the greatest part of the Moors, he return'd into the heart of the Mountains without any loss. Abraham not expecting this at all, and not feeing the return of the two Renegadoes he had brought along with him, fancy'd they had betray'd him; and with the few men he had left, without making any longer stay, he return'd with all expedition to Toledo, where he dy'd of Grief.

Tariff was very much troubled at Alfigr, this bad event; but having not then Sadness. Troops fufficient in one Body to go force the Asturies, he contented himfelf with leading upon the frontier the most men he could, that so he might hinder the Christians of the Mountains, from coming to make Inroads upon the Moors. Then he refolv'd upon sending to Almanzor, his Master, a very exact Relation of all he had thitherto done, with the state of all things in Spain, and to ask what was his Pleasure to have further done for his Service. As he was finishing his Dispatches, he had a Letter brought him from Pelage; which Translated out of Spanish into Arabick, is as follows.

A LETTER.

King Pelage, to General Tariff Abenziet.

HE King D. Pelage, Lawful Heir, Successour in a Right Line of the Kingdom of Spain, by the death of the King D. Rodrigo, whose sins may God pardon, they being, doubtless, the cause of his ruine, and my misfortune; to the Valiant and Renowned Captain Tariff Abenziet, Cherish'd and Esteem'd by the Caliph Almanzor, his Master; Greeting. Tho I am as great a sinner as any other, and that I have nothing good but the confidence I put in the mercy of God; I am willing to make known to thee, that in thy name came two Envoys, who being my Relations, ought not to have come to me, since they were Traytors to their Country; I thought my self oblig'd to punish them, as I have done; and was content to signifie to thee at the same time, that the thou hast very unjustly, and by the force of thy Arms, feiz'd on a Kingdom that appertains to me; nevertheless,

I hope, with the help of God, to regain it in spight of thee. But if it be not his will, I beseech him to give me the Force and Courage to dye, I and mine, for the Justice of my Cause, and for the Truth of our Faith, rather than to groan under the Cruel Yoak that thou wouldst impose upon us; beseeching him daily to give affairs that current as I desire.

Tariff Abenziet upon reading Pelage's of our Letter, had more joy to hear of Rodrigo's Death, which was the thing he had the most desire to know, than uneasiness for all the rest. Wherefore he made an end of writing Almanzor the following Letter.

A LETTER.

General Tariff Abenziet, to Caliph Valid Almanzor, Emperour of the Moors.

Raise be given to the Soveraign God, to whom alone is due Sacrifice and Prayer; and afterwards to the most High and most Illustrious Caliph, and Emperour of the Moors, his Vicar, the Buckler of God, and Defender of his Law, the most Noble Caliph Valid Almanzor; whose good Designs may God bring about, to the Happiness and Tranguillity of all his Subjects, as is wish d by Tariff Abenziet, General of his Armies; one of his least, but most Faithful Servants.

Spain is absolutely conquer'd and rang'd under your Obedience; all the Nations have receiv'd the * Toak as far as their mighty high Mountains, by the Spaniards called the Pirenees, which parts their Kingdom from that of France. And there is nothing more to conquer in all that vast extent of Land, but a small corner corner of Earth, amid very rugged Mountains, where some Christians have taken refuge, that is of no great consideration, and a very great and Populous Town, called Hispalis, upon the Coasts of the great Sea, for fear of introducing among your forces the Pestilence that rages in that place. I have restor'd to Count Julian all bis Lands, as you promis'd him. I salute your Grandeur, and the Felicity of so many great successes. In the midst of a great Province called Andalousia, is a very populous Town, where the King D. Rodrigo commonly had his Residence; whose Death I have been lately informed of by one of his Relations: I have settled there as Vice-roy, with your good liking, the Person of Abulcacim Adilbar, your faithful Servant: This City being proper to serve as Metropolis to the whole Kingdom; which I make known to your Celcitude, that you may order him as you shall please, for your service.

Muca, the Vice-roy of Africa, has rendred great services in this Expedition, where he was several times in danger of losing his Life; insomuch that he, doubtles, merits a great Reward, and hopes it from your Goodness and Magnificence. May God heap his blessings daily upon you.

The Conquest of Spain From Cordoua, the 23 day of the Moon Rageb, the year of the Hegira 94.

All the Answer Almanzor made to this Letter, was, That Tariff should come himself to him into Arabia, to give him an account of the particulars of the Conquest; ordering Muca to return into his Government of Africa; and fending Adilbar Letters Patents, as Vice-roy of all the Kingdom of Spain, ordering all the particular Governous that had been left in the Towns, to whom he had fent Commissions, to obey him in all things.

These two great Captains having receiv'd this order, pass'd both into Africa immediately after; whence Tariff went into Arabia, while Muca remain'd in his Government.

Pelage takes the City of Gixa from the Moors, and burns it.

CInce that Pelage had once vanquish'd the Moors, he did not doubt but that he could defend himself in his Mountains. All the Christians of the Neighbouring Provinces repair'd to him after this Victory, flattering themselves with the hopes he might one day refore them to their Liberty. Till then they did not believe there to have been any place in all Spain, where they could shelter themselves from the sury of those Conquerors, for as they had not any Retreat where they could be in fafety, they suffer'd themselves to be put into fetters. But the young People, that had no Wives, and were most proper for Warfare, began to make their Escapes, by little and little, out of the Moors hands; and steal away by night into the Mountains, where Pelage had his abode, so to put themselves under his Protection. Infomuch that in 2 fhort time there was a pretty confide. rable Body of an Army affembled. Wherefore feeing that General Abraham was Retreated into Castile, he resolv'd to make some attempt as might accrue to the Credit of his Party.

With this Design, he drew together the most men he could, and made up a body of fix thousand men, with whom he came to a small City, call'd Gixa by the Spaniards, and by the Arabs after they had taken it, Takla. Wherefore having block'd it up with this small Army, few Moors were there that expected to be beleaguer'd by Pelage, whom they did not think so hardy as to budge out of the Tenure where he had hold. Nevertheless they stood out so obstinately with the Captain that commanded in the Place, that they all dy'd bravely fighting, refusing to listen to any Capitulation.

Pelage much fatisfy'd with this small Conquest, caus'd it to be fortify'd, left there as Governour one of his Captains, call'd Manuzes, and retired with his men into the heart of the Mountain, which the Christians in their Tongue call Oviedo. Tariff was much afflicted at this bad success. He then perceiv'd that the Renegado-Bishops had well advis'd him, when they would have induc'd him to have render'd himself master of that nook of Land; wherefore imagining that fome mischief would come on't; after having given order to the Troops that were in those parts to be ready, and fent word to Mahomet Abenramin, Governour of Toledo, to draw the most he could together. He also sent him Troops from him, under one of his Captains, all'd Abenhamza; who carry'd him an order to attack Pelage. All their Troops being affembled, were found to make up a Body of twelve thousand good men, with whom Aberramin bent his march towards the North.

Pelage making no doubt of getting the advantage this second time as he had done the former, refolv'd upon waiting the coming of the Enemy in that Town he had newly conquer'd, with about soo men he then had with him.

.While he was preparing to go receive the Moors there, a Christian Renegado gave him notice that his Captain Manuzes, had made an offer to Tariff of delivering up to him that little little City; nay, and to feize on his Person. Pelage could not doubt of the truth of what he told him, when he had shew'd him a Letter he carry'd from that General to Manuzes, wherein was the whole train of the Conspiracy minuted against him. He highly entertain'd the Renegado; and after having made him a world of Presents he defired him, fince he express'd so much defire to ferve his Country, to return to the Moors Camp, to tell Abenramin that it was not yet time for him to advance, Pelage not being yet arriv'd in the Town with all his Forces.

The Renegado having accepted this Commission, made that forged answer to Abenramin, who was very glad at it, and fent him forthwith back to Gixa, to stay till the Prince was there arriv'd, and to bring him immediate word. But instead of going thither, he went to the Christians Camp. Pelage not losing time, march'd all the night; and being acquainted with the Country, he arriv'd at the Camp of the Moors, without they having the least inckling of him, and attack'd them with so much vigour, that he kill'd kill'd a very great number of them, . and put all the rest to flight; obliging General Abenramin to Retreat in great disorder.

In this Attack the Moors loft two thousand men, and the Christians about eight hundred. But Pelage fearing to ingage too far in the Battel with Abenramin, who had double the number of his men; and who, after having rally'd his Souldiers that had been taken unprovided, might furround him; he made a hasty retreat to the Town of Gixa; where as foon as he was entred, he caus'd the Traytor Manuzes to be hang'd, and his Body burnt. Then for fear the Moors might take that Town again, after having turn'd out all its Inhabitants, he fet fire to't, and Retreated into the Mountains to defend their entrance against the Moors, by whom he was under fear of being pürfu'd.

And indeed Abenramin follow'd Pelage at the heels; so as that he arriv'd at Gixá before the fire was quite extinguished. Whereupon having cross'd it without making any stay, that he might endeavour to overtake Pelage, he found him posted at the same Place where General Abraham was defeated. He found this Post too difficult to force. that he durst not undertake it, for fear of not fucceeding; and contenting himself with garnishing well that frontier, he bent his march back to Toledo with all his Army, being asham'd at his having perform'd fo little in this Expedition. He fignify'd to Tariff all that had pass'd, while he expected his orders, which he defired he would fend him; and this General fignify'd to him to separate his Troops, and remain in his Government till farther order. This caus'd Abenramin to dismis his Army, and feek to recreate himfelf after the fatigues of this War.

Adilbar went to invest the City of Hispalis with his Army, but is constrain'd to raise the Siege, and return to Cordoua.

Hen that General Tariff and the Vice-roy Muca had repaised the Sea, before they began their Voyage, the one into the Eaft, according to Almanzor's orders, and the other into the West, to his Palace of Morocco, where his Brother Ismael expected him; they caus'd Proclamation * to be made * Borels throughout all Africa, in the name of Acolean, the Emperour their Master; That all cry by those that were minded to pass into found of Spain, there to inhabit, needed only to repair thither; and that they should have Lands given them to cultivate, Houses to dwell in, with all the conveniences necessary to Life; and great Priviledges and Exemptions. Thefe Promises, and the rumour of the Beauty of the Country, caus'd a world of People to pass the Sea; not only Natural Moors, but Jews of the Hebrew Nation, who pass'd it with their Wives time that and Children, and all the Goods they had, to the number of fifty thousand Families, according to the Register taken of 'em by Adilbar.

This Vice-roy, by an express order he had receiv'd from Almanzor, of repopulating that great Kingdom, which he had confided to his Conduct, diftributed with an admirable economy, throughout the Kingdom of Spain these new Spaniards, according as they landed. The Governours, and Subordinate Commanders, gave afterwards in the Provinces and Cities, to each of those Families, Conquer'd Lands, proportionably as they were convenient for 'em to live in, whereof he made particular Estates. And they had all so great an application to this matter, and kept such good order, that this great extent of Land became in a short space more populous, and more cultivated, than it had ever been before; and the new comers were fo well accustomed with the Natives of the Country, that there feem'd not to be any difference among em, Adilbar seeing so numerous a People under his fway, and all the particular Governours so obedient to his will *, * Muthin, thought himself in a posture to make obey'd by some attempt for the service of his Master. He remembred that they had not dared to attack Hispalis, by reason of the Pestilence that raged there when the Generals went away; and had informations that the Christians flocked thither from all patts, fince its ceasing. For which reason, having assembled the greatest number he could of Infantry and Cavalry, and made a Body of twelve thousand Foot, and two thoufand Horse; he departed from Cordona, after having given all the Directions requisite, and march'd directly to Hispalisin the head of this Army; small indeed, but very brave, and provided with all things necessary *. He straight- * Mula ways fent a Trumpeter to Summons wellapthe Inhabitants to Surrender, promi-pointed, fing them all fort of good usage, as Generals of Armies are wont to do in fuch occasions.

The Inhabitants, without liftening to his Promifes, or being concern'd at his L.4 Threats, Threats, made no other answer, but that they were resolv'd to defend the goodness of their Cause to the last, and to be cut all in pieces, rather than fall under Slavery.

After such an Answer, Adilbar thought there was no farther parlying. On the morrow morning, he caus'd a most surious Assault to be made: But as the Besieged were well inform'd of the manner with which the Moors had perform'd the Sieges of all the other Towns of Spain, they had made Provision of a world of Posts of several fashions, which they fill'd with boyling Oyl, Juniper and Turpentine, and threw them upon the Besiegers; which burnt them alive, and incapacitated them from fighting, by reason of the violence of the pain they suffer'd.

Farica.

Adilbar confus'd and vex'd at the damage his men had receiv'd from the Beleaguer'd, without its being in his Power to do them any, caus'd the Retreat to be founded, and his Troops put into Quarters, to see what he had to do: He had lost four hundred men in this first Assault, and plainly perceiv'd, that as often as he employ'd force, there would be nothing to be got.

got. Wherefore he imagin'd, that being Master of the Field, and having Victuals abundance in his Army, whose subsistance he could furnish to as long as he pleas'd, in the Neighbourhood of that Town, he could so well block up the Avenues, that it should be constrain'd to Surrender, without his so much as losing one man; he resolv'd not to decamp thence till he had samish'd it.

The Beleaguer'd gueffing that the Moors had taken this course, since they had remained sive and twenty days together, without continuing their attacks; they resolv'd to Sally out upon them, when as they least expected it. For this purpose, without making any Bustle, as could make the Besiegers suspect their Design, they assembled all their resolute* men; And one Night, *Ingi, Ha-Sallying out of one of their Gates, they chi, Resolution them. To avoid the inconveniences that commonly happen in Engagements that are perform'd by Night, the Governour had order'd all those that were commanded out upon that Sally, to cease fighting, and retire into the Town, as soon as he should cause a Horn to be sounded; whose sound he had caus'd them to observe. Thus fearing they might engage too far on the pursuit of the Moors, who might cut them off, he caus'd it to be sounded, when he judg'd it convenient.

The Christians had much ado to resolve upon quitting the Engagement, being very much sless of them on all sides, who gave way before them on all sides, and were pursu'd by them with the Sword in their Reins: But at the long run, retiring by little and little, in the order that had been prescrib'd them, they re-entred the Town, where they were receiv'd with great Applauses, by the Beleaguer'd; who caus'd a world of Musical Instruments to be sounded, in token of Joy for so great a Victory.

The Day being come, the flaughter the Christians had made appear'd to Adilbar much greater than he had believ'd it: And perceiving the strength of this Town, and the Valour of those that defended it, he found it more convenient to raise the Siege, than to persist any longer obstinately in an Enterprize, which was more difficult than he had imagin'd. Whereupon he took his march back to Cordoua; and having found his Army diminish'd in two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, he had lost in this Siege, he separated it, and put it into good Quarters in the Country, that it might recover it self.

CHAP. XXI.

Adilbar makes a second Attempt upon Hispalis, and is as Suc. cessless as before.

Dilbar was disconsolate at the bad event of the first Enterprize he had made for the Valid's Service: He was asham'd that the only Town the Christians held in Spain, had resisted him, after Tariff, with fo little pains, had taken all the rest. He imagind all the Moors * murmur'd at it, and Murmur, himself found that Almanzor not effectually call himself absolute Master of that Country, as long as that Town was not under his Obedience.

Wherefore having fent for all the Governours of those Provinces, and conferred with them about the necessity, and the means for the reducing it; he began to make greater Preparations than he had yet done; and having affembled fifteen fifteen thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, he took the Field in the beginning of the Spring *, of the 95th * Fael Year of the Hegira, and march'd di-Arabeb, rectly to Hispalis; in the Neighbourhood whereof, he lodg'd all his Troops.

The tryal he had made in the first Siege, of the Valour and Industry of the Beleaguer'd, which had made him break up from thence, without having effected the least, had render'd him wife; and as he was a good * Com- *Harbat mander, he had caus'd certain Chariots Abidad, to be made, cover'd with very thick for War. Boards, that so his Souldiers might, as under cover, fight shelter'd, without any inconvenience from the Boyling Oyl, and all the other things, that the Christians might throw from off their Walls.

After having begun, by Summoning the Town again to Surrender, and reœiv'd thence as haughty an Answer as that he had before, he caus'd his cover'd Chariots to advance, with a multitude of Pioneers, fustained by a good number of Souldiers, that he had plac'd underneath; and having brought them near the Courtin, he had it un-

dermin'd

" Hird. Scandal. dermin'd in the Places he judg'd to be the weakest.

The Beleaguer'd feeing these Ma. chines, and dreading the effect of them affembled to confult about the most preper means to secure themselves from so great a danger. Their Governour call'd Sarmato, being a Man of Wit and Resolution let them see that then was no occasion for them to be alarmid as they were, and caus'd them to fera rate into three Brigades, that they might the more eafily sustain the three different Attacks.

the Precautions he could imagine against all that the Beleaguer'd could invent for their defence; and as he had caus'd to be made a kind of great *The Arabs Stone-Bows *, with which they shot up call them very great Stones, he pointed them to the places where they could do most mischies; and making 'em mount upon his Chariots, he caus'd fo great a quantity of 'em to be thrown, that few places were there in the City, where the Christians could be in fafety.

> Sarmato seeing so many extraordinary means employ'd to attack him, fell on his fide side also to the contriving some for his Defence; and having caus'd the strongest of the Inhabitants to assemble, with fitting Instruments for the removing the Earth, he caus'd Ramparts to be rais'd. behind and within the Walls, that when even the Moors should have effected the making some Breaches therein. they might find 'em stopt with so much Earth, as that it would be impossible for them to enter'em. This wife Governour, by this Precaution, put himlef in a posture of receiving no damage from all the Inventions of his Enemies: Adilbar had not omitted any one of for there was already fo much Earth behind the Wall, that when they had broken it, they would find they had got nothing by the bargain: Nay, and many had been crush'd to pieces by the great Stones the Christians roll'd upon those Chariots: And as for those the Moors caus'd to be thrown into the Town, as there stood Sentinels on the top of the Towers, to give the Signal to the Inhabitants to make their escape,

> Adilbar being in Despondency at so many ill successes, resolv'd upon giving a general Assault. While he was preparing all his Forces for that purpose, and that the Scaling, Ladders were erected on one side, he caus'd his Chariots to take a great circuit towards the other end of the City; for the undermining the Wall at the same time. Whereupon, having given the Signal for the attack, at break of day, which he had chosen for that intent, the Besiegers went on with an extraordinary sury, and the Besieged sustain'd it with great resolution.

The Moors in the mean while, having again chang'd their Chariots, and fastening upon part of the Wall that was weaker than the rest, made a great Breach, by which some enter'd the Town; but Sarmato repairing in all hast thither, with a great many Souldiers, left them there not long; and having drove them thence, caus'd that gap to be stopt up with a great quantity of Earth: Certain it is, the Town had been taken, had he delay'd one moment longer; but the Night having put an end to the Conflict, Adilbar found he had lost five hundred men, whereas the Besieged had lost but two hundred.

hundred: So great an opposition made him take up again the Resolution he took the time before, of stopping up all the Avenues of the Town, that fo the Christians, being press'd by hunger and thirst, might be constrain'd to Surrender. He remain'd there in this manner forty five days, after which, Sarmato considering that Adilbar might hold him block'd up in this manner, as much, and as long as he pleas'd, being Master of the Field, from whence he might have all forts of Refreshments; he resolv'd upon going to attack him in his Camp, as he had done the time before.

Wherefore having assembled twelve hundred Foot, choice men, and a hundred Horse, he caus'd them to Sally out at Mid-night, through a Posterngate of the Town. The Moors having seen the Christians had been so long without sighting, did not expect this sudden Assault at all: By this means the Christians kill'd a very great number of them, and retired in good order, by savour of the night. Adilbar searing the like accident to that which befell him in the former Siege, sent a part of his Horse to stop the Soul-diers that were minded to purfue them: infomuch, that he found the next day that he had loft four hundred Foot, and thirty Horse, whereas there fell not above a hundred and fifty of the Christians, whom this General caus'd to be Interr'd as well as the Moors, for fear of their creating an Infection in his Camp.

The Besieged were much satisfy'd with the fuccess of this feeond Sally: but in a short time after, Adilbar caus'd a fecond assault to be made, which was fo furious, that whatever refistance they made, the Moors at length gain'd a Courtine. The Governour flying thither forthwith with a re-inforcement of Souldiers, perform'd fo well, that he at last drove the Moors again from their Post, and put it into a posture of Defence. This Conflict lasted from break of day, till Three of the Clock in the * Afternoon; call'd Ha-when Adilbar feeing his men disheartcar in Ara-ned, caus'd a Retreat to be founded. to dress the wounded. He found among the Dead three hundred Moors, and about a hundred and fifty Christians; but there was a very great number wounded; and among others, one of his Officers, called Hali Abenzainee, which afflicted him very much, and whom he caus'd carefully to be dress'd, as well as all the rest; confirming himself in the first Resolution he had taken, of having the Town by Famine.

The Besieged searing to want Victuals, that they might precaution themselves before-hand, with the remedies necessary against the mischief wherewith they were threatned, had caus'd very deep * Canals to be made, from * Hazir, the Western Gate of their Town to a Ditches, great River, that passing very near their Walls, falls afterwards into the By the means of these Canals, Sea. they went into the River with great Boats; and these Canals being Fortify'd all along with good Trenches, infomuch that the Cavalry could not do them any mischief, there came to them, from time to time, Victuals from the Mountains of a certain Country, call'd Biscaya: These Canals were a very great help to the Besieged; for besides their having by this means all things brought them, the Water of the River ferv'd them for a thousand conveniences.

Adilbar having not then any Ships to hinder the Christians from having every moment all necessaries, was very much at a loss, and was loath to refolve upon raising the Siege once again: When news was brought him of the revolt of the Governour of Valence, call'd Abubaher el Handali, and of the Inroads he made into the Neighbour. ing Provinces of that Kingdom.

So urgent an evil, and which he faw himself indispensably oblig'd forthwith to remedy, made him presently raise the Siege, and march long days journeys to Cordoua; which the Christi. ans of Hispalis were very glad of.

He great Siege, wherein Abubaher el Handali, Governour of Valence, saw Adilbar engag'd in, had made him hope that he might in that time, render himself absolute Master of that fine Province. In this Defign, having gain'd all the Governours of the smaller Cities, and all the Martial Men under his Authority, he would needs cast off the Valid's Oath; and having brought a finall Army on Foot, he began to make Incursions into the Neighbourhood, that he might by force oblige all the People thereabouts to obey him as their Soveraign Lord.

Adilbar being inform'd of these Transactions, as I said in the foregoing Chapter; caus'd a new Army to afsemble, of ten thousand Foot, and  $M_3$ eight

The Rebel feeing fogreat an Army coming against him, and having no place of fafety whether to Retire. thought it much better to try the fortune of a Battel, and win it, or dye like a Man of Courage, than go basely vield himself up. Having inspired the same resolution into the minds of his Adherents, and dispos'd them into the best order he could, as soon as Adilbar had fet footing in his Government, he went to meet him; and in that Battel, did all that could be done by a good General, and good Souldier; but being at last taken, and all his men defeated, Adilbar caused his Head to be ftruck

He made a strict scrutiny after all those that had had a hand in this Rebellion, that he might of them accordingly make an Exemplary Punishment: And indeed, many Commanders and Captains had the same Fate with their Leader; and after having reduc'd that Country to its Obedience, and there established one of his Captains, call'd Mahomet Abenbucar, he return'd to Cordona, and dismissed his Troops.

Almanzor gives Tariff a place in his Council, and chooses him for his Ambassadour Extraordinary, for the Conclusion of the Prince his Sons Match, with the King of Thunis's Daughter.

Lmanzor making reflection on the great Services render'd him by General Tariff, on all occasions, and particularly in the Conquest of the Kingdom of Spain; for the discharging himself of the Obligation he had to him of so great an augmentation of Empire, and of fuch vast Riches he had thence deriv'd, had not a more Glorious Recompence to give him, than a place among those of his Coun-*Mutagua cil *, and who share in the administra-Quilari- tion of all his Kingdoms; for which aca, Ali-nifler of account he put him into that number, and ment of our Crown, the Peace and Tranquillity of the State, and the greatest Good and Utility of our Subjects; and to hinder the Dissentions and Discords that commonly happen after the Death of Kings, which are wont to overturn the best established Empires; and for other Considerations, us thereunto moving; we have thought convenient to Renounce, Grant and Transport, by these Presents *, all the Soveraign Authority that we have, with the Scepter and Crown we bear, in such manner as it appertains to us, in Quality of Caliph, Absolute and Soveraign Lord, without acknowledging any Person living for Superiour in Temperals; to our Well Beloved, and Obedient Son, the Wise, Virtuous, and accomplished Aboulvalid Abenacer, our eldest Son, Lawful Heir, and nearest Successour; on whom may God bestow the Wisdom necessary for the Governing all his Kingdoms, in Juch manner, as that all his Subjects may enjoy a continual Peace and Tranquillity, by reserving to us the direct Siegneury, in case of Death, or failure of Succession, or any other such like misfortune, or disgrace; which we pray God not to Suffer to make way for our returning to the Throne, to which we no longer pretend any Right.

The Conquest of Spain

For which reason, We signifie and order to our well-beloved Son, and Lawful Heir and Successor in the second Degree, the Prince Abraham Amcari, and to all those of our Council of State and of War, and to all the Governours, Cadis, Generals and Captains; and to all, and as many as there are of our Officers and Subjects, of what Quality and Condition Soever they be, to hold and Honour, as Emperour of all these Kingdoms, our said Son Aboulvalid Abenacer; and in that Quality, make Oath of Allegiance and Fidelity to him, as from this present we mean to make to him our selves, acknowledging him for King, and giving him all the Power we have hitherto had, according to the Laws, commanding expressy all our Subjects * to *Alumyid, obey his Commands, and Execute all his People. Orders, as if they were issued out by us, on pain not only of our Malediction, but of that of God, of his anger, as they must needs all incur that want Fidelity to their King; and for a token of the effectual Possession of all that is contain'd in these Presents, we mean to put them our selves into his hand, in the presence of all the Governours and Subjects, assembled in our Palace for that purpose. For such is our Express determinate Will and Pleasure; to which end, we have our selves fign'd these Presents with our hand, and have caus'd our Great Seal to be put thereto.

The Conquest of Spain

* Beginning of the month of Odober, in the year 716 of our Lord.

In our Palace of Corbal, in Arabia Fælix, the 3d. of the Moon de Vaguel, in the Year 95.

By the means of this Renunciation, Aboulvalid Abenacer being acknowledg'd and Crown'd King, his Father Almanzor took a chosen number of his most Faithful and most Ancient Domesticks, to attend and serve him in the Place he had resolv'd upon making his Retreat, leaving his Youngest Son Abraham Amcari, with the King, his Eldest; and no sooner was he arriv'd in that Solitude, but that his Instrmities daily augmenting, he fell into an ill Distemper, which lasted upon him till Death, which, in short, fell out in a little time after.

Abraham had a haughty Spirit, and and mmense Ambition; the Caliph being very jealous of him, and uneasse on his score, that he might deprive him of the means of somenting Cabals against him, sent him into Stony Arabia, which is a Country of very small extent; and where he could not find wherewithal to do him any great mischief.

About that time the Governour of Damas, Abenbukar by name, who all his life long had had roving and Chimerical thoughts, imagin'd that Almanzor being no longer in the World, he might attempt all with impunity. He thought of no less than of dispossessing Aboutvalid, and of placing himself in his stead; and had affembled a great Army, with which he ravag'd all the Provinces bordering upon his Government. The Caliph was also oblig'd on his fide to take the Field, to bring him to his Duty; when that Prince Abraham Amcari, who was continually gnaw'd with the lust of Reigning, and omitting nothing he judg'd useful to his Designs *, sound it to be the most * Albadar, propitious juncture he could wish, for lost no the manifesting them to the World. occasion. Whereupon he on his fide affembled the most Horse and Foot that was possible for him; and after having pais'd the Defarts of Arabia*, he march'd direct- * Alcahari, ly to Court with all his forces, making Sandy semblance of coming to his Brothers Mountains assistance against Abenbukar the Rebel. tains.

And accordingly he met with a kind welcome at first; but having all on the fudden changed face, and having feiz'd on the Castle, and the best Gates of the City, about midnight he fent to feize on the principal persons of the Court as well Officers as people of Service. whom he thought Loyal to his Brother. and had 'em all beheaded. This fo intimidated all the rest, that either out of the fear they had of him or by reason of the little affection they bore the King, and the esteem they had for this Prince, whom they faw to be brave and generous, and love War*, they were easily inclin'd to acknowledge him for their King; nay, and there was so great a concourse of People at his Coronation, that meaning to improve that first heat he saw them in, and not thinking it convenient to let it cool again, he took the Field with all those that suffer'd themselves to espouse his Party. His Brother Aboulvalid was gone at the head of his Forces against Abenbukar; wherefore he thought he could eafily pen him up, between his own Army, and that of that Rebel. And after having left at Court a Captain, a Creature of his, call'd Xaira Alxadali, in whom he put entire confidence, he march'd directly to his Brother with all his Troops; which he found to make up twenty thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse.

The King was fo furpriz'd at this News*, that he was ready to run mad; * Aturmuand to fee if he could apply fome re-News! medy to fo great and un-foreseen an Evil, he quitted the design of reducing Abenbukar, to return with all expedition to meet his Brother.

The two Armies being in fight of one another, Aboulvalid fent a man on purpose to Abraham, to diverthim from so unjust and unreasonable an Enterprize; and representing to him that he was going to be the occasion of the Death of an infinite number of men, which could be only imputed to him alone; but that if he would defift from his defign, he promis'd him in the word of a King, to forget all that was pass'd, and to receive him as his Friend and Brother *. Abraham made * Taha, no other answer to this, but that he obedience, was not come thither to be reconcil'd, protectibut to fight; that he stood in no need on, friendof the friendship he offer'd him, but of the Crown he had upon his Head;

he

that he was Almanzor's Son and Heir as well as he; that he had only to prepare to defend himself, and that their Rights being at the point of their Swords, they would that day decide which of the two had the best, giving the Kingdom to him that should gain the Victory.

The Conquest of Spain

Having in this manner fent back Aboulvalid's mediator, and having threatned to have him hang'd, if he came again to importune him with fuch like harrangues. The Caliph with grief faw himself oblig'd to give Battel; but at last, having marshall'd all his Army in Battalia, it began with some fquadrons of Horse of both sides, who were a long while mingled with one another, before any judgment could be pass'd which of the two had the advantage: And this Skirmish that lasted above half the day, without any great loss on either side, plainly thew'd the Cavalry to be compos'd only of good men, that knew admirably well both to attack and defend.

On the morrow, the twelfth of the *Inche Moon Dulquehala*, in the Year 96, month of December, the Battel was renew'd, and prov'd in the year still more bloody for both Parties; for 717.

it lasted from Morning till Noon, without ones being able to judge on which side the Victory leand: But at length, Aboulvalid's people beginning to buckle, and those of 'Abraham to break in upon them on all sides, Aboulvalid searing to fall into his Brothers hands, made his escape out of the hottest of the Engagement, upon a very sleet Horse, after having made a sign to some of his people to sollow him. The Kings Retreat utterly dishearten'd all his men, who were immediately after easily put * to slight.

The Prince pursu'd them at their fly pinels; and after having kill'd a very great number of them, he return'd to give the necessary orders for all Occurrences, and then return against Abenbukar, while that Aboulvalid was withdrawn into the Kingdom of Thunis, where he was kindly receiv'd by his Father-in-Law, who knowing the misfortune that was befallen him, through the persidy and wickedness of his Brother, comforted him the best he could, and promis'd to assist him in his revenge.

CHAP. XXIV.

Abraham Amcary goes to fight Abenbukar; defeats him, and has him beheaded.

Braham being puft up with the winning of this Battel, and overjoy'd to see that all the paces he made. conducted him upon the Throne, without any stop, he march'd directly to Court; where having conven'd the Estates, to confirm the Government he meant to establish, he caus'd them there to take a new Oath of Allegiance to him, by which, all that he had not been able to get approved of, but by fome, before his going to fight his Brother, was confirm'd and ratify'd by all the rest: And thus was he own'd and declar'd by a common confent, Emperour of all Almanzor's Realms, as his Lawful Heir.

Then having made such Regalations as he pleas'd, and bestow'd great Bounties Bounties on all his Creatures, without losing time, he took the Field with fifteen thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, to go to Damascus.

Abenbukar, being fully inform'd of all these Transactions, came to meet him with an Army of twenty thoufand Foot, and two thousand Horse, infomuch, that they were not long without coming to blows. Abraham would needs, before he gave the Signal for Battel, do as lawful Kings do to Rebels; and fent to tell him, That as he had not any Right to the Crown, he could not believe he would perfift in his bad designs, or that he would be wanting in his Allegiance to his Prince; wherefore he offer'd to Pardon him all that had pass'd, if he would but return to his Duty.

Abenbukar having caus'd the Princes Envoy to come into his presence, would not go about to excuse himself with forry reasons, as do all Traytors that can never have any that are good; but answer'd him sharply, and like a gallant man, That between two Traytors, and two Disloyalists, as they both were, he had only the hand of him: but that Abraham had committed a much greater infidelity in dispossessing his Brother Aboulvalid, who was his Lawful King, according to the disposition of his Father, and that of Nature, than he, in withdrawing himself from his obedience, with all the Province of which he was Governour, feeing all *Nagarem, his people oppress'd with impositions *, Subsidies. and very severely us'd by King Aboulvalid.

That he had learnt that to state things aright, Nature caus'd no body to be born upon a Throne; that all the Kings of the Earth were Tyrants; that the Scepter belong'd to him to whom God had given the strength to bear it; and the Soveraign Authority to him that had Wisdom and Ability sufficient to govern the people; and that as all Created things had their beginning, and their end, Monarchies were not exempt from this general vicissitude; that thus there was no need of reasoning any farther.

Abraham being extremely provok'd at so haughty and so insolent an Answer, would no longer deser giving Battel, contrary to the advice of most of his Officers, who counsell'd him to stay the Conjunction of all his Forces, that were not yet arriv'd, Abubenkar's Army being much stronger than his, and all his Troops appearing much more sprightful; but they could not prevail with him to change the resolution he had taken.

Some of the Cavalry that were detach'd on both fides, having began the Skirmish, they quickly engaged in a general Battel, that was very obstinately fought, and very bloody, sibenbukar being skill'd in all the stratagems of War, had plac'd his best Officer in Ambuscade behind a Hill, with five hundred chosen Horse, that had order not to appear till the Battel was far engag'd, and then to attack the Princes men in the Rear; and this occasion'd Abenbukar's winning the Battel: For this Captain, bolting just in the nick from his Ambuscade, put all Abraham's Forces into fuch great diforder, that this Prince feeing himself penn'd up on all fides, threw himself from off his Horse, and so fled o're the Mountains, that he might get again into Arabia.

Abenbukar being Master of the Field of Battel, return'd to Damascus, loaded with Honour, and the Spoils of Abraham's Camp he had plunder'd; and expecting my upon his back, he did not difmiss his, but put it only into good Quarters in that Country.

Abraham, at his return, having met with a very cool reception from the Arabians, it spighted him extremely, and gave him great confusion. Wherefore having again conven'd the Governours and Commanders that were under his sway, he gave them to understand that he was resolv'd not to suffer Abenbukar to glory long in his Victory; and commanded them to make ready to take the Field in fifty days space, with all the Forces they had under their charge. They fo very punctually executed this order, that at the day appointed, he found himself at the head of an Army of forty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse: with which he march'd again for Syria.

Abenbukar had not slept on his side, and knowing the great preparations that were making against him, caused Proclamation to be made throughout all the neighbouring Countries, of large pay, and great Rewards, for all those that would come into his service, and bring him Troops: By this means he fram'd a body of thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; and with these Forces staid Prince Abraham's coming up, who without entring into any parleys, as he had done the time before, as foon as he came in fight of Abenbukar's Army, he march'd directly upon him, to engage him in the Battel, that was very bloody on both sides. But at last, Abenbukar's Troops being defeated, he was taken generously fighting, and brought to Abraham, who, without faying a word to him, in the rage he was in, and without giving him time to speak, or the Executioner to come, he cut his Throat with his own hands, striking him so furious a blow with his Scimitar upon the nape of his Neck, that he cut off his Head, which he caus'd to be put on the top of a Pike, on the Gate of Damascus. He was not satisfy'd with having himself perform'd the Execution, for having caus'd him to be fleed, he commanded the placing upon that same Gate that Wretches Skin, which he had caus'd to be fill'd with straw; and the like usage did all those meet with that had had a hand in this Rebellion. At length, being being grown weary of putting people to Death, and believing that Province absolutely reduc'd, and sufficiently chastiz'd, he lest there as Governour, a Captain, in whom he had great considence, call'd Abencirix, and return'd to recreate himself at Court, where he was receiv'd by his Partizans with great Huzzahs, and mighty Exultation.

CHAP. XXV.

King Aboulvalid assembles a great Army in Africa, and marches against his Brother Abraham, gives him Battel, wherein his Brother is kill'd.

KING Aboulvalid being retir'd to Thunis, as I have before observ'd, labour'd under great anxiety to see himfelf drove out of his Kingdom by his own Brother, and employ'd his thoughts wholly upon the means of being reveng'd. Mahomet Gilhair was no less concern'd than this Unhappy Prince, confidering him not barely as his Son-in-law, but as his own Son. Wherefore having refolv'd on affifting him with all his might, he made great Levies thoughout the whole extent of his Kingdom, gave Commissions to all the principal Persons of his Court and Country, and fitted out a great Naval Army, which he had ftor'd stor'd with all the Provisions necessary for a great Embarkment.

Aboulvalid did not forget himself on his side, and well perceiving there was no man that could assist him more strongly in his occasions than Muca, Vice-roy of Morocco, and of all the African Provinces; he sent a man on purpose to him in a Felucca, with this Letter.

King Aboulvalid's Letter, to Muca, Vice-roy of Morocco and Africa.

Praise be to God, Amen.

THE Great and Warlike Emperour of the Arabs, of the high Lineage of Motaleb; Vicar of God, and Defender of his Law; Aboulvalid Abenacer; Son of the most High and most Dread Caliph, and Emperour of the Arabs, Valid Almanzor: To the Valiant Captain, Virtuous and Accomplish Knight; Trusty and Loyal Servant of our Royal Crown, Muca, our Vice-roy in Africa, Greeting. Abenbukar Generour vernour of Damascus, meaning to withdraw himself from his Allegiance to Us. and we having taken the Field with an Army to chastize him, Prince Abraham our Brother, taking that occasion to execute the design he long had had of troubling the State, and having had the boldness to take up Arms against Us, to the great dammage of our Subjects, and to the great contempt of the Obedience to Us owning; for which, according to all Laws of Justice, he merits Death as well as Abenbukar; and for the procuring his punishment, and preventing the mistortunes that bis Rebellion may produce, you are order'd, That as foon as you shall have receiv'd this Letter, to cause to assemble, with all possible diligence, the greatest number of Troops possible, in the extent of our Kingdom of Africa, and that you cause them to embark with all the Provisions necessary, nay, and with all the Gold and Silver that is found in Our Treasury of Morocco, all which to be sent Us to Thunis, where we are at present; further conjuring You, if Tou have any one in whom Tou have sufficient confidence, as to trust with him the care of your Government, to come your self in Person at the head of your Army, to lerve

In his room in Africa he left a very brave Man, and in whom he had great Confidence, call'd Alicunicy, a Native of Stony Arabia, and arriv'd fafe at Thunis with all his Army, at the end of the Moon of Rabeh, on the 2 of that same year 97 of the Hegira.

> > There

There he found King Aboulvalid employ'd in Shipping the Troops he had got together in those parts; who embrac'd him very affectionately, and carefs'd him to a high degree. This Prince had already nominated Tariff Abenziet, who had atchiev'd the Conquest of the Kingdom of Spain, in his Fathers Lifetime, Generalissimo of all his Forces, and had cast his Eyes upon him, as upon the greatest, and most lucky Captain of those times.

These two great Armies having been a long while in embarking, the King put at length to Sea, and with as fair a Wind as he could wish, in a sew days time he arriv'd in Arabia; where having made a Review of all his Troops, his Army was found to be sixty sive thousand Foot, and sive thousand Horse, which gave him a great deal of Joy.

All the People of that Coast, seeing so numerous and so flourishing an Army, far from opposing his Descent, declar'd themselves immediately for him.

In the mean while, Prince Abraham knowing all his Brothers Preparations, didnotfleeponhis fide. He had affembled all the Chiefs of the Arabians, and after having given em notice of the storm wherewith they were threatned, and having made them apprehend that they were to expect little less than to be strangled, if Aboulvalid ever re-mounted upon the Throne; and that it was much better to dye in the Bed of Honour, than upon a Scaffold, as he was resolved to do, to shew em the way.

fence, they made up a very confiderable Army, that was found to be fixty thousand men, got truly in the best

They were all so sensibly perswaded by his Arguments, that in their own De-manner they could together.

Abraham having made no difficulty to go meet his Brother with his Forces, the Battel was fought in the Plain of Cahar, on the 3 of the Moon Dulquihida*, in the year 97. It lasted from Sun rising to its setting. Abraham then perform'd all that could be done by a great General, and a good Souldier: But seeing his Army in Disorder, he threw himself into the hottest of the Engagement, where he was kill'd with his Sword in his hand.

Aboutvalid did much lament his not having been able to take him alive; and doubt-doubtless, as he had ever had a kindness for him, maugre all the mischief he had done him, he would have given him his life, and would have been contented with continuing him in a perpetual imprisonment. Wherefore having caus'd his Body to be put into a Coffin, he pursu'd his way towards Carbal, whence the Queen his Wife was coming to meet him; tho she had ever been kept as a Prisoner, the Prince had ever had her very civilly treated: Aboulvalid was mighty joyful to fee her again, but could not forbear expressing much grief for Abraham's death; he caus'd the whole Court to put on * mourning, and affisted at his * Hisu, Funeral, which he caus'd to be per-mourning; form'd with great Pomp; nay, he was feen to shed tears in that occasion; but he had not the same mildness and clemency for all the Officers that fided with his Brother; he put a great number of them to Death, and let himself to retrieve his Authority, and fet matters again to rights throughout the whole Empire.

General Tariff receiv'd a wound in his Right Arm in the Battel, which he had neglected at first, by not refraining to mount on Horseback, after his usual manner; but through the little care he took of it, and through the toyl and drudgery of marching, his Arm swell'd in such manner as to gangre; and so in a few days time sent him out of the world.

Aboulvalid was much griev'd at the loss of so great a General, and to shew the esteem he had for him, he caus'd him to be Interr'd with great magnificency, and had the same honours paid him, as had been paid to the Person of his Brother. And I can certainly say one thing of him that is somewhat singular, that his Valour was accompany'd with such great Fortune in War, that he never undertook any enterprize but what he sped in to his honour.

This Prince, after having punish'd, as I have said, those that were revolted against him, began with recompencing those that had serv'd him so usefully in that War, by distributing among them the Governments, Lieutenancies, and Employs, insomuch, that they were all satisfy'd with the returns he made to their Services; and then set his thoughts upon enjoying amid Pleasure, the repose that had cost him so dear. Adilbar, Vice-roy of Spain, leads his Army into Biscaya, against Pelagius, and thence returns without doing ought.

A Dilbar having sped so ill in the Siege of Hispalis, he had receiv'd order from King Aboulvalid his Master, to go the soonest he could, to make the Conquest of those Mountains, where Pelage had made his Retreat, and where an infinite number of Christians were gone to find him, from all the corners of Spain, to save themselves, with their Wives and Children, from the sury of the Moors.

Whereupon, he fent a Renegado-spy, to examine the strength of those Places where this Prince lurk'd, and to enquire into the number of the Souldiers he had with him, and the world of People that had there taken refuge.

The

The Renegado being entred into the Country, pretended to make his escape as well as the other Christians. from the Perfecution of the Moors, and over-ran all the Mountains of Biscaya. where he most carefully observed all he faw, in pursuance of the orders he had received from Adilbar: But when upon his departure thence again, he was brought before Pelage, by the Guards he had plac'd upon the Frontiers, having been taken for a spy-as he really was; Pelage ask'd him a Thousand Questions, but as he was cunning and crafty, he anfwer'd very pertinently, and without being at a loss: Pelage nevertheless was not willing to let him go, and kept him some days in Prison; but at length, finding nothing against him but a weak suspicion, with which his Imagination had been possess'd, he set him at liberty.

After this, the Renegado took his time so well, that he sound the means to get again to Cordoua, where he deliver'd Adilbar an account of all that had befaln him, and of all he had feen; affuring him, that it was no difficult matter to force the pass of those Mountains, that were guarded only by

by a small handful of men, of little Courage.

Adilbar being incourag'd by this Relation, resolv'd upon undertaking the War against Pelage, well perceiving that if he had once reduc'd the Christians of that Canton, Hispalis would no longer put him in pain, the fuccours that Town had receiv'd from Biscaya, having occasion'd it's not being surrendred. Wherefore he prepar'd fuddenly to befiege it, as not believing those Mountainers could resist him long; and flattering himself with the hopes of rendring Aboulvalid the absolute Master of all Spain, as far as the Pyrenean Mountains, that separate it from France.

For this purpose he assembled twelve thousand Foot, and would not take any Horse along, as not believing they could be useful to him in so rocky a Country *. With this small Army, * Guhaira, compos'd of choice men, he advanc'd Country as far as the place by the Spaniards of Rocks.

call'd the Term of War.

Pelage having notice of his march, conven'd the Principal Persons of the Cantons of Biscaya, to concert with them the means of opposing him; and their unanimous opinion was, to think think of defending the Entrance of the Mountains, which was very difficult; this was also the sentiment of Pelage; so as that having plac'd five hundred chosen men, and well arm'd in Ambuscade in a great Quarry or Den, that is under a steep Rock, Pelage plac'd himself a little higher with sisteen hundred men, being all he could assemble.

The Moors going about to mount, to get to that Mountains top, Pelage charg'd them with the small Forces he had, but had quickly been overcome, had not the five hundred men that were hid in that Cavern, as I newly hinted, appeared in the nick behind the Enemies, put them into disorder, kill'd a great number of them, and put all the rest to flight.

That day Adilbar by computation lost a thousand men, besides the great number of those that were dangerously Wounded; whereas the Christians lost but four hundred.

Pelage Retreated forthwith, with all his Men, into the hallow of those Mountains, to defend the Entrance of them, well knowing this to be the most important of all; insomuch, that Adilbar bar inrag'd at the loss he had newly undergone; all the faults of which he reflected upon the Christian Renegado, who had deceiv'd him; he sent him to the Gallows.

After having well examin'd the difficulty there was in forcing fuch narrow and steep Passages, he found his continuing any longer in that Country, would be only the lofing of time and men, and resolv'd to put off this Enterprize till another time, when as he might find an entrance more easie to force, than that from whence he had been newly repuls'd. Wherefore without staying there much longer, he return'd into Andalousia, where he dismiss'd his Army, and set his thoughts wholly upon Regulating and Policying that Kingdom, while Pelage and his People bless'd God for so favourable a fuccess, and were confirmed in their opinion of those Mountains, being made in due manner for the putting a stop to the Conquests of the Moors, and ferve for an Azylam and Retreat to the Christians; wherefore they us'd their utmost endeavours to fortify them to the best advantage.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Death of the King of Thunis, and of the great Wars Aboulvalid was oblig'd to make to render himself Master of that Kingdom.

HE joy King Aboulvalid had for the victory he had gain'd over his Brother Abraham, was quickly ruffled by the news he received in a little space after, of the Death of his Fatherin-law, Mahomet Gilhair. He left no other Children save Queen Omhalair, wherefore he refolv'd to fend out of hand to take possession of so fine an Inheritance, for fear that if he deferr'd any longer, some change might happen, as commonly does in fuch occasions: for fo folemn an Embaffy, he chose one of his favourites, call'd Abulcacim Aben Marchan, who departed in great haste with all his Train, and was very kindly receiv'd by all the Grandees of that Court, and Lodg'd in the Deceased Kings Palace.

Having forthwith conven'd all the Members of the Council of that Kingdom, and having let them peruse the Powers he had from Aboulvalid, in his Name to take Possession of that State; they examin'd them, and having found them in the form they ought to be, King Aboulvalid was acknowledg'd and declar'd King of that great Kingdom, and Abulcacim Aben Marchan Vice-roy in his absence. But as in all times, and all Countries, People there are Transported with a defire of Ruling; one of the Principal Governours was there of this; who flattering himself with the thought that being Mahomet Gilhairs near Relation, the Kingdom ought rather to appertain to him, than to his Daughter, began under-hand to follicit all the Leading men and Governours, each in his turn, to affift him with his Forces. He represented to them, That being born in the Country, and with them brought up, and the late Kings nearest Relation, the Crown belong'd to him, rather than to a Foreigner; and had the knack so to coaks them with fine promises, that they at last refolv'd folv'd among themselves for the most part, to throw off Aboulvalid's Yoak, and to place him in his stead upon the Throne. Hacan (so was this Captain call'd) wanting not courage for fo noble an enterprize; having affembled all the heads of his Party, entred by main force into the Palace, where Aben Marchan had his residence. This Vice-King diffrusted nothing; but as foon as he had notice of fo very treacherous a design, having put himself upon his defence with what happen'd to be about him, he chose rather to dye in defending himself generously, than to fall alive into the hands of the Revolted. Thus though they only really desir'd to take him Prisoner, they killed him, with all those that were about him, without somuch as one escaping.

The rumour of this rifing being immediately spread, all those of Hacan's Party proclaim'd him King, after the wonted manner, taking withal an Oath of Allegiance to him: And this new King sail'd not at his accession to the Crown, to bestow savours upon all his Partizans, and to give, as all Usurpers do, all the orders necessary for the accession of the same of the

At that same time, one Wednesday Subb, a evening, a very great Comet appear'd Comet. upon the Horison; about whose angle it took up towards the East: It was accompany'd with very thick Clouds, extraordinary Winds, and pernicious Exhalations, and appear'd for forty whole days together. This very much affrighting the new King, he caus'd the Mathematicians and Astrologers of the Country to meet; who, after having very exactly examin'd the Elevation and Nature of this Comet, and the fign in which it rise, said that it threatned the Kingdom with great Wars, and the Kings Person with an imminent Death.

While they were still making their Observations, a great Earthquake was selt, and being repeated to the eighth, or ninth time: and there arose so surious a storm at Sea by the great Eastern Winds, that all the people of this Country, thought that the end of the World was coming; nay, they said they had heard by night, strange howlings in the Mountains, that seem'd to be roaring Lyons. But what most amaz'd and was most strange, was a Cloud that coming from the West, burst upon on their heads, and rain'd a water of the colour of blood. The Earthquakes I have newly mention'd, had topfy-turvyed some Houses, and over-whelm'd whole Families uuder their ruines; infomuch, that not only the people, but the King himself was in a Consternation. These surprizing signs of Heavens anger, were follow'd with a great scarcity of Corn, that famish'd to death feveral persons, as also with certain Contagious * Sores, that taking them in the Groyn, and behind the Ears, knock'd off a very great number.

Aboulvalid, whom Hacan's Rebellion had very much inrag'd, feeing the people weary'd and ruin'd by all the late Wars, was not in a very good posture to undertake so great an one as this that fell upon his hands. He conven'd the Estates, where having expos'd the necessity he was under, to go reduce under his obedience a Kingdom that so lawfully belong'd to him, on the account of the Queen his Wife; and having demanded of them fuccours in Money, they answer'd him that they should not fail him in his need, but that it was requisite first to know in what state 205 state the Kingdom of Thunis was, and whether the Pestilence that had already lasted two months was ceasid; the refolution was taken that enquiry should be made; and the persons sent thither brought word back, That a world of people was there dead of it, but that the contagion began to diminish. This occasion'd the hastening the preparations for that War; infomuch, that a great number of flout Ships were fitted out for the taking on Board fo great an Army, as was that then preparing to be embark'd in it, in the Spring in the Year following.

Aboulvalid makes Muca Generalissimo of his Armies, and after having reduc'd the Kingdom of Thunis under his Obedience, returns into Arabia.

Vea had ferv'd Aboulvalid ufefully in the War he had with his Brother; he was his Father Almanzor's most Trusty Servant, and had a great share in the honour of the Conquest of Spain: All these reasons made this Prince cast his eyes upon him, to confer on him the Conduct of his Army; and being then in his Government, he fent him an express Courier to give him notice of this new War, and that he had nominated him Generalissimo in all his Armies; the terms of his Letter to him were as follow.

Aboulvalid's

Aboulvalid's Letter to Muca Abenzairi, Generalissimo in his Armies.

Praise be to our Soveraign God, Amen.

THE most High, and most Dread, King of the Arabians; Vicar of God, and Defender of his Law, Aboulvalid Abenacer; Son of the Martial, Caliph, and Protector of the Faith, Valid Almanzor; to the Governour of our Kingdom of Africa; the Prudent, Virtuous, and accomplished Gentleman, Loyal and Faithful Servant of our Crown, and Captain-General of our Armies, by Sea and Land; Muca Abenzair, Greeting. We write to you at present, to let you know that the Great Caliph Mahomet Gilhair, King of Thunis, our honour'd Lord and Father-in-law being dead, and the virtuous Abulcacim Aben Marchan our Servant, who had been in our name to take possession of that Kingdom, of Right and Justice to us belonging, hardly beginning to make our people tast the sweetness of our Reign, when

when Captain Hacan, as you doubtless have been already inform'd, entred by main force into the Palace Royal of Thunis: and after having kill dour Governour, and all our faithful Servants, had withdrawn himself from his Allegiance to us: and by force, caus'd himself to be ownd the absolute King of all the Country: which he governs Tyrannically. Wherefore, for the recovery of that Kingdom, it is necessary that you assemble the greatest number of Troops as shall be possible for you, in the Kingdoms that are under your Government; and that you fet forth with them and our Army, to repair to the Port *It is not of Capha *, in the midst of the month of Ragab, in the approaching hundredth Year place that of the Hegira; at which time, we will go to joyn you with the Army which we cause it's call'd to be rais'd in the Kingdom of Syria and at present. Arabia; till when we refer the resolving with you upon all matters, enjoyning you to order all as you shall judge most expedient, by your Prudence and Valour; wherein we have an entire confidence.

> From our Presence, in the Palace of Corbal, in Arabia Fælix, the 2d. of the Moon Mahairan, in the Year 99.

Muca

Muca having received the King his Masters Orders, was overjoy'd at the employment with which he honour'd him; and having made Leavies throughout all his Kingdom, and heap'd up all forts of Ammunition, as well for the Fleet he had fitted out, as for his Land Army; he embark'd with twenty thousand very brisk men, and made Sail towards the Levant, while the King was embark'd with twenty five thoufand Foot, and eight hundred Horse, he had affembled in Arabia, and made Sail towards the West; insomuch, that the two Armies join'd happily in the Port of Capha. This fill'd this Prince full of joy, for he would needs come in Person to this War, well perceiving that when he should have reduc'd the Kingdom of Thunis, he was absolute Master of all Africa, from the Sea of the Levant, to that of the Ponant. Wherefore having Landed at Thunis, he found not any opposition at his defcent, and had the means to marshal both his Armies in Battel-array.

Hacan being fully inform'd of these Warlike preparations, was extremely intimidated: Nevertheless, as he had been long prepard to maintain his Usurpation,

Usurpation, he had assembled forty thousand Foot, and eight thousand Horse; with whom he went with great Resolution to meet Aboulvalid, and couragiously stood his coming in a large Plain, not far distant from the Sea, and call'd Falh Almaligue*; where having drawn up his Army in Battalia, it began by two bodies of Horse, that Skirmish'd for some time before they ingag'd the rest in the Battel, that lasted all that day, from Three a Clock in the Afternoon, till Night *, that feobscurity. parated the two Armies with the loss of eight hundred Foot, and about three hundred Horse, on the Kings side; and five hundred Foot, and four hundred Horie on that of Hacan, without reckoning a number of Wounded; among others, one of Muca's Children, call'd Ismael, had two thrusts with a Pike in his Thigh, for which Aboulva. lid was much concern'd. But the Father feeing the Grief his Master thence receiv'd, told him with a very gay and resolute countenance, that there was not matter for fo much trouble as his Majesty express'd; neither he nor his Son being come thither to gain Riches, but to dye for his Service; and that

thus,

thus, though his Son should not recover of his Wounds, the matter would be fmall, fince he was only Born to dye: On the contrary, he should hold his Death as well employ'd, because he had first so well aveng'd it; and this was true, for he had kill'd with his own hand a very great number of the Enemies; and that day perform'd actions worthy of an Eternal memory.

On the morrow, which was the 9th. At the beof the Moon of Taquel, in the hun-ginning of dredth Year, the Battel renew'd at the Year break of day, and lasted till Noon, 725. of when Hacan's Men began to Buckle, our Lord. and were at length by dint of Sword defeated. Hacan seeing the flight of his Forces, fought his fafety in galloping after them.

The King being entred into Thunis, did not think he had gain'd an absolute Victory, unless he had Hacan in his hands: So as that he forthwith fent Foot and Horse out on all sides to seek him, promising them great rewards if they brought him to him. fought him fo well, that the Dogs of 2 Flock of Sheep barking after him in a Cave where he was hid, created a defire in them to go thither, and P 2 occasion'd occasiond his being taken. He was immediately brought before Aboulvalid, to whom having given a great deal of ill language, as a desperate man, that faw there was no Remission for him; the King, that was otherwife very mild, was so provok'd, that he caus'd him to be impal'd alive, and left him in that condition upon the Gate of the Town, where he languish'd five whole days; at the end of which he dy'd a very cruel Death. All the Principal Leaders of this Rebellion were then Beheaded; and one of the General Officers of the Army, call'd Abraham Hacen, was chosen to be Vice-roy of Thunis, in the room of Hacan the Rebel.

Aboulvalid having settled his Authority in that Country, and brought all things again into their Primitive order, set forth again with his Army towards the Levant; and being arriv'd at Carbal, where he was receiv'd with great Acclamations, the first thing he did, was to reward all the Principal men that had serv'd him in that War, and particularly Muca, whom he made of his high Council, and one of the Principal Ministers of his State. After this, with-without staying longer in his Palace than was necessary to repose himself, he thought of taking a Pilgrimage to Mecque, whither he went with a part of his Court.

Being on his return through the Defarts, there arose so surious a Wind, that removing whole Mountains of Sand from one side to another, as sometime happens; it buryed above three hundred Persons of his Retinue, that were sound thus Interr'd alive, which much afflicted him. But having pass'd them, at the long run he arrived in good health in Arabia Fælix, where he was receiv'd with great joy by all his Court, and thought in good earnest to recreate himself, after all the troubles he had thitherto undergone.

The Oath of Allegiance which Aboutvalid causes the States to take to Jacob Almanzor his Son.

HE Caliph thinking only now of leading a more calm and fedate life, and confidering that he had not any other Children than Jacob Almanzor capable of succeeding him; he was very willing to fecure to him the Crown, before he was overtaken by Death, that regards Kings no more than other men. For which reason, after having conven'd all the Grandees of his Kingdom, a Morabite, call'd Mahomet Algaseli, that was in great favour with him, and whose advice he demanded in things of the highest importance; by his order made them a long Speech, on which he gave them to understand, the reason for which he had call'd them together; which was to own Prince Jacob Almanzor for Lawful King of all his great Realms, after his Fathers Death. The States Curci having declar'd, they all approv'd this Canopy, design, as a thing very advantageous to Throne. the good and profit of all the Nations. King Aboulvalid having one day put on his Royal Robes, fat in his Throne, and caus'd Prince Jacob Almanzor to fit there with him, on his Right Hand; and then all the Governours of the Places being present, Mahomet Algaseli the Morabite, being feated on the Kings Lest Hand, rose up and utter'd these words, with a loud and intelligible voice: Gentlemen, Honour'd Governours, Virtuous Lords, and all you here present; King Aboulvalid wills and requires, that you own Prince Jacob Almanzor, his Lawful Son, who is here present, for absolute Master of all his Realms, after his Death. Are you willing to make Oath to him accordingly? To which they answer'd aloud, Tes, we are willing; Do then, reply'd Algaseli, as a token of the Allegiance you promise to him, and of the Possession he from this present is going to take of the Crown, all that the King and I am going to do. Then the King rifing, took his Son by the Hand, and feated him in his Throne; and the Prince having taken the Right Hand of his Father, kiss'd it for a mark of his Obedience. The Father on his fide, for a token of * Rida, the Bleffing * he gave him, laid his Benedicti-Hand upon his Head; and also kissing his Sons Hand, fat down by him on his Right Hand; Algeseli the Morabite did the same, and sat down on his Left; and after him all the Governours of the Provinces having also kiss'd his Hand; an Alfaqui having brought the Alcoran, wrapt up in a very rich stuff, and having laid it on the Table, Algaseli the Morabite rose up from his Seat, and lifting up his voice, that he might be heard by the whole Assembly; Honorable Governours, said he, and Virtuous Knights, and also every one of you here present; Do not you swear and promise by the Supreme God, and by all that is contain'd in this Book, to acknowledge and hold all your life long, Prince Jacob Almanzor, for your King and Soveraign of all the Realms, as Son and Lawful Heir, and Successiour of King Aboulvalid Abenacer, his Father? And all having answer'd, Tes, we promise it: Let him then, the Morabite reply'd, that shall not accomplish what he has now promis'd, be declar'd declar'd Perjur'd, Infamous *, and a Traytor * Hazir, to the State, and may the curse of the Great Perjurd. God fall upon him, and on all his; and the whole Assembly cry'd, Amen. And the Morabite having said, with an audible voice, That for the folemnity of their Oath of Allegiance, all should do the same as the King and he did. The King being got up, and having kissed the Alcoran, put it upon his Head, the Morabite, and all the Chiefs and Governours did the same afterwards, each in their order. After which, the Morabite being got up from his Seat, and having address'd his Speech to Prince Jacob Almanzor; Tour Celsitude, said he to him, do you not swear and promise by the most Great, and most High, and by all that is contain'd in this Book, in Quality of Kings, and Soveraign of these Realms, to do Justice to his Subjects; and maintain and keep all the Priviledges, that the Kings his Predecessors in general, and each of them in particular have granted them; so as that you may cause them to live in Peace, and not suffer any wrong to be done them. And the Prince having faid, Tes, and that he swore and promis'd it: Mind it well then, reply'd Algaseli, for if you do not do it, the curse of God will fall upon you, as upon one perjur'd; to which the Prince having answer'd, Amen: Let your Celsitude then, continued he, to show you make an solemn Oath, do as I do: In uttering these words, he took the Book, and having kis'd, and put it on his Head, he presented it to the Prince, who did the like.

This Ceremony being finish'd, all the Governours, and Leaders of Troops, going out before the Prince, set him on Horseback, and carry'd him around through the City, in great Pomp, amid the noise of a world of Instruments: And all alighting at the great Mosch; and having said their Prayers there, return'd with the same Pomp to the Palace, where the King his Father waited his coming, and where the whole Cavalcade ended and separated.

This folemnity lasted three whole days; during which, there was nought but Feasts, Conserts of Musick, Turnaments, and all the other Recreations to be thought of.

Thefe

These three days that had been given to joy being pass'd, the King caus'd the States to be held once again in his Palace, to confirm and ratify all that had been done; and the Morabite open'd the Sessions in these terms. Illustrious Captains, Generous Governours, Brave Cavaliers, that are here all present; do not you confirm and ratify the Oath of Allegience, to Prince Jacob Almanzor, our Soveraign Lord, who is here present? And all having answer'd Tes; and faid expressly, that they ratify'd it. Let all, pursu'd he, for the conclusion of so solemn an Oath, do then, as the King and I shall do: In finishing these words the King arose, and having taken the Alcoran, he kiss'd it, and put it again upon the Table; he also took the Prince his Sons hand and kiss'd it; and after that the Morabite, and all those that compos'd that great Assembly, had done the fame, were dissolv'd, after having all receiv'd some favours from the King, who was very much fatisfyd with feeing the Accomplishment of a thing he had so much desir'd.

Aboulvalid's Death, who leaves to one of his Kinsmen, call'd Mahomet Amcari, the Regency of his State, during his Sons Minority.

A Boulvalid was much joy'd to fee all his great Kingdoms in Peace, and all the Wars and Diffentions he had been oblig'd to undergo, absolutely stifled: But as the Wheel of Fortune turns continually, and there is no man upon Earth, that has a continued and an accomplish'd happiness; all Great, and all Mighty, as he was, he try'd it like other men; For he fell into so obstinate and so violent a Feaver, that whatever care the greatest and ablest Physicians in the World took, that were at that time, they could not bring any Remedy to it. Wherefore this Prince feeing that all that was given him, did did him more hurt than good, resolved upon taking nothing at all: And one day, in their presence, and in that of the Principal Persons of his Court, he faid, That he plainly perceiv'd it to be the Will of God, that he should dye of that illness; that thus he thank'd them for all the pains they had thitherto taken, and that he had no longer any need of them. Then he difmis'd them, as well as all those that were about his Bed, and fent for Mahomet Algaseli the Morabite, to confer with him upon all things, and to provide the best he could for the Government of the State, after his Death; which was what put him most in pain: For he plainly faw his Son was as yet too Young, to be able to contain fo many Nations in their Duty; and that it was abfolutely requisite, to give the Regency of the State to some one, during his Minority. He was much at a loss, how to determine on whom to pitch; but he and Algaseli at last concluded, that there was not a man of more Ability, nor in whom more Confidence could be put, than in Mahomet Amcari; his very near Relation; insomuch, that having had him call'd to him, to tell him the choice he had made of his Person; and Amcari having made him a thousand Protestations of Acknowledgment and Fidelity, he nam'd him in his last Will and Testament, the Regent and Lieutenant-General of the Empire, till that his Son Almanzor was at Age to Govern.

He liv'd but a very few days after having declar'd his Will in this manner. And as he had govern'd with much Lenity and Justice, his Funeral, that was perform'd with great state, was accompany'd with a real Mourning by all the People, and with fuch tears as departed from a down-right Affliction. Mahomet Amcari having immediately taken upon him the management of Affairs, the Queen Mother refolv'd to live retired, as being well becoming a Widow; and that she might have the more care of her Son, and keep him in the greater fecurity, withdrew to a Country House, whither the Caliph Almanzor, her Father-in-law, formerly retired; and where there was all forts of Conveniences.

Wherefore being gone thither to shut her self up with all her Family, and that of the King her Son; Amcari seeing himself absolute Master of the State, and obey'd by all the Governours of all the Realms that compose this great Empire, began to be fensible of the movements of Ambition, and the defire of Reigning, that glides by little and little, like an Earth-worm, into the Hearts of all men; who from the nothing, wherein they were, see themselves rais'd up to Authority: For after having began to prick him on by little bites, they came at length to gnaw him all over.

Having his mind posses'd with this thought, and only thinking of the means to bring it about, he thought it expedient to begin with gaining over the Principal men of the Council and Army, and the Governours of the Towns and Provinces; as those that had all the Forces of the State in their hands. Wherefore he let not any occasion slip, of making them Presents, and of obliging them. When any of them dy'd, he only put in their place fuch people as of whom he was well affured *, and whom he * Muthen, thought would not fail him on oc-ferve him. casion; and did this with so much diffimulation, that as he spoke to no body of his defign, nor did any body perceive it. At length, having dispos'd all things to his fancy; having reduc'd them to the point he judged proper for the Executing of his Treason, he would needs communicate his mind to one of his principal friends, whom he had made head of the Council of War, call'd Aben Culeyman; who told him frankly, That fince he ask'd him his advice, he found great inconveniences, in undertaking a thing of that nature, as long as the Prince Jacob Almanzor his Master was alive: For as he was beloved by all his Fathers Creatures, there would be doubtless, many Governours would declare for him; that this enterprize would feem very strange to the Arabians; and that it would meet with great difficulties in the Provinces; where, in imitation of himfelf.

felf, there would not be a Governour, but would make himself King, in the extent of his Government: That thus, whereas all he intended to do, was only to augment his Authority, and be absolute and independant, he would find himself abyss'd, in the stormy Sea of Wars, which fuch an *over-turning would occasion; and that after he had thus Rioted the people, it would be no longer in his power to calm them: These reasons seem'd very pertinent to Mahomet Amcari; and as he had ever fped in following the other Councils given him by Aben Culeyman, he plainly saw, that this he then gave him, departed from a man confummated in the experience of State Affairs: Wherefore he bethought himself of an indubitable expedient, which was to rid himself of Prince Almanzor. He was resolv'd not to communicate this thought to any other than the same Aben Culeyman; but that Wise Councellour still endeavoured to divert him gently, and by the best reasons he could bethink himself of from so wicked a design; being in no wife wife able to approve of fo horrible a cruelty, and so base and black an action. Nevertheless perceiving he could not root this intention out of his mind, he was furiously vex'd; and having at last resolv'd upon applying a fitting remedy, he thought it to be time to discover the secret of this Treason, to the Captain-General, as to his best friend, and to the Prince his Masters most Faithful Servant. Muca being much furpriz'd at fuch an infidelity, having confirmed his friend in the defign he already had, of preventing fo great a mischief; after having concerted together what they had to do, and promis'd one another the strictest secresie, they resolv'd that Aben Culeyman should continue to put the Regent upon this matter, of which he made him the confident; and that he should endeavour to discover by what byass he pretended to bring about his defign, that so they might by the same means break all his measures.

by the Moors.

This being their refult, Aben Culeyman happening to be with Amearialone, did not fail to put him upon Q 2 that that Chapter; and the Regent having told him, That finding the difficulties he had urg'd rational to all intents, he was relolved to overcome them, by causing the Prince to be Poyson'd; after which all things would be easie to him: Aben Culeyman having to this made him answer. That he was in the right; and having much ado to entertain the vexation he had on this account, he left him as foon as he could, and went in all hast to inform Muca. These two Trusty Servants, considering the blackness of the Regents action, and of what a consequence it was to think of faving the Prince their Master, from the peril that was preparing against him, found there to be less evil in bereaving the Traytor Mahomet Amcari of his life, and fail him in that occasion, than to keep his fecret, to be Traytors to their Lawful King: Wherefore they both resolv'd together, that they might make the less noise and disorder, to invite him one day to Dinner, and to seize on his Person while at Table: But in the mean while, for fear the the Prince should fall into the Trap that was laid for him, while they were taking their measures for fo hardy a defign, they thought it convenient to inform the Queen of all that pass'd, that so she might be upon her Guard, against the Treason that was preparing against the Prince her Son. Whereupon Muca went to her with all Expedition, in that retir'd House I mention'd; and having acquainted her with the Regents Perfidy, she was much afflicted; but she received comfort at the same, in having found fuch Loyal Persons as would discover it to her. Muca having intreated the Queen, to keep the matter very fecret, as it highly became her to do, both for her Sons fake; and the whole Kingdoms; and having affurd him, the might make account of him, and that he was resolv'd to dye for her Service; he return'd in all hast to the Court of Mahomet, the Regent.

The Regent Amcari, meaning to bereave Prince Almanzor of his Life, is discovered, and punished for his Persidy.

Ahomet Amcari, still contriving to work the Princes Death, and seeking for that purpose, the safest and least noisie means, caus'd *Gosbrim, a very rich *Garment to be made, a Poyson'd to make him a Present of, as is customary at certain times: And after having caus'd it to be well prepar'd, with a very subtile Poyson, sent it to the Prince, with a thousand other very gallant, and very curious Presents.

All those of the Queens Palace, seeing these Presents unfolded, were immediately transported with the beauty of that Vestment; all saying, That the Prince could not put on a finer: But the Queen being afraid of its being poyson'd, would by no means suffer him to wear it that day, no not so much as try it: And the Night being come, to see if she had any reason to harbour such apprehensions, she had it put upon a great Greyhound, that was found dead on the morrow, his Skin all cover'd with Sores.

by the Moors:

Mahomet's malice and defign being then past all doubt, this generous Princess being very Prudent, and having a Courage above her Sex; without making any noise of the thing she had discover'd, or of the resolution she had taken in her mind to punish such an attempt, fent to tell Mahomet Ameari the Regent, That the Prince would be very glad to see him, and she alfo, to discourse upon some matters of consequence. And knowing him to be upon the way thither, she caus'd all her Guards to keep the entrance of the Gate, as if it were to do him honour; but with order, That none of his should be admitted in with him. As foon as he was entred, they feiz'd on his his Person, and brought him into the Queens presence; who having reproach'd him with his perfidy, and told him how she knew all his Treacherous design, she had an Executioner call'd in, whom she had at hand on purpose for his Execution, and had his Throat cut into the Bason of a Fountain that was in the Castle: Then having caus'd his Body to be laid upon an Afs, had it carry'd to Carbal, and fo through all the Streets of that City, follow'd by the publick Criers, who by found of Trumpet, Proclaimed he was in that condition, for having design'd to Poyson his King, and feize on the Crown; and after having left it in the publick place, she caus'd his Head to be set upon the Gate of the City.

She did not long defer coming to Carbal, with the Prince her Son; and entring the Palace, she sent immediately for the two Faithful Servants, who had revealed to her this most Trayterous design; and told them, That the obligation she lay under, for the Service they

by the Moors. had both newly done her, was fo great, that she knew not how to express the acknowledgement she had of it; that the only reward proportionate to it; was the Regency of the State; that she had had a defign to give it to the one and to the other: but that as this great Authority which they both equally deserv'd, could not be divided, and that she was afraid of offending one of the two, if she gave it to the other, she was resolv'd to Govern the best she could her self. without giving any one that Title: but that she would ever manage all things by their Councils, and that they should ever be the first of the State after her. They were both very well fatisfy'd with this resolution; and News being come of a Party that was framing in the West, she sent them both, as those in whom she had most confidence; namely, Aben Culeyman into the Kingdom of Thunis, and Muca into that of Morocco, with an absolute Authority, there to contain the People in their Duty. Whereupon they both departed from Carbal.

Prince Almanzor's Death; the Queen his Mother dyes of Grief, in a Short time after, and Ali Abilhachek causes himself to be Proclaimed Caliph.

Ueen Ombalair made it the whole ftudy and application of her mind, to bring up well her Son, the Prince Jacob Almanzor, whom she had ever in her Eye. One day when that she was gone to Dine with him, in a Garden out of the Town, the Prince after Dinner threw himself upon a Bed, in a Room where he fell a sleep; and a Spider having prick'd him in the Right Eye, his Face swell'd in such a manner, and put him to such great Pain, and occasion'd such dangerous Fits, as that he liv'd but seven days.

The Queen laid his Death so to heart, that not being capable of receiving any Confolation, or of furviving a Son, for whom she had fo tender an affection; she fell into so great a Languishment, that all the Remedies of the Physicians in no wife eafing her Malady, dy'd fifteen days after him.

These two Deaths, so sudden and so close upon one another, occasion'd a mighty amazement in the Court, that was for some time in such a furprize, that their whole discourse was upon fo extraordinary a thing. But at length, coming to think that there was none left of the Race of the Almanzors, to whom the Crown appertain'd by Succession; the Leading men of the Arabians, and the Governours of the Provinces, began to make their Cabals. One of them, call'd Ali Abilhacheck, chancing to have more Friends than the rest, caus'd himself himself to be Proclaim'd Caliph; and after having caus'd an Oath of Allegiance to be taken to him, and had his Coronation folemniz'd with great Pomp, with the Solemnity, and the Merriments ments that are wont to be practic'd in fuch like occasions; he began with rewarding those that rais'd him to the place he held, giving them Governments and Employs; infomuch, that there was no body but on whom he conferr'd some favour: Besides this, he apply'd himself in good earnest to make regulations upon all abuses that were introduc'd into the Government. and to do Justice to all those that requir'd it of him, without making them wait; insomuch that he acquir'd in a short time not only a great Reputation, but also the friendship of all the people; they esteem'd themselves very happy in being govern'd by so good a King.

Thus ended the Line of the Aboulvalid Almanzors.
